PARTY PLANNER

Consultants take care of all those little details

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The party consultant could be called the one-stop party shop.

"Come to see me when you decide to give a party and I can take everything from there – from the first phone call until the guests leave at the end of the evening," says Raquel Sananes-Grad (398-0217).

A "born organizer," Sananes-Grad says that she has two types of clientele. "I can provide an initial consultation and steer them in the right direction or I can remain with them every step of the way. People can use as much or as little of my services as they require. I can be many things to many people."

Having a trouble-shooter when planning a simchah can relieve hosts of a lot of unnecessary stress, she says.

"I had one client who ordered invitations that did not require envelopes. When it came time to address them, however, they realized that the invitations could not go through a laser printer.

"After panicking, she approached me and I suggested having labels printed and put on the invitations. It was a simple thing but it put my client's mind at ease knowing I was looking after the problem."

Another time, she says, she saw a florist unloading flowers at the synagogue and realized immediately that they were bringing the wrong order. "I took care of the mix-up and the bridal party never found out. It was just one less thing to worry about.

"A bride goes through a lot of mixed emotions and taking care of small details is the last thing she needs. That is exactly what I am there for. A missing seating card or a rip in a bridesmaid's dress may be a small thing for me to fix, but for the bride, it seems enormous. I come to the wedding with everything, including my kitchen sink, and I am prepared for any event."

Choreographing the wedding day is something else the bridal party needn't have to worry about, Sananes-Grad says. "I am there from morning until the sweet table opens. I am with the bride when she dresses, when she is having her makeup applied and throughout the photography session.

"I provide the professionals with an outline of the evening and I make sure it is flowing smoothly. The band leader knows when to play the wedding song, when to break for dinner, when to play the horah and when to announce the speeches. I also make sure the photographer is taking the right pictures, the caterer is running on time – I don't leave anything to guesswork. When I'm there, the hosts can enjoy their own party."

Singers generate good vibrations

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Entertainment is one key to a successful simchah and a feature which adds to the entertainment is a singer.

The vibes generated by good music are contagious, evoking tears and laughter. While electronics can eliminate the need to hire a big band for a large party, it can't replace the voice.

If you plan to hire a singer, Boris Neiman (905-889-3643), and Aelita of Aelita and Friends (222-7573), have some tips for you.

You can put some trust in a reputation, because it takes plenty of time and work to build. References and referrals from friends give some idea where to start looking but ultimately, says Aelita, the singer's style and repertoire have to please you.

Hear a prospective singer live, Boris insists. Stage presence matters as much as the voice. Tapes and videos can be edited and a reputable singer will suggest venues where you can audition them.

While a singer needs talent and charm, hard work is equally important, Aelita says. So is the right combination of love for one's work, business sense, and the capacity to have fun

For the singer, as it is for you, your simchah should be both a joint venture and a labor of love.

The singer should be flexible, work well with musicians and other entertainers as well as people such as caterers and party managers, and be able to integrate their role with every other aspect of the event.

Tact matters too. At a wedding, for example, a singer has to take into consideration the tastes of two extended families.

The perfect band sets the perfect party mood

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

For a successful simchah, choose your band with care. Paul Zurin of the Paul Zurin Band (905-770-3084) ranks the band as high as the caterer. David Buchbinder of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band (416-703-6894) believes that music does more than anything else to make the mood of a simchah.

With so many more bands than there once were, it's hard to choose. Buchbinder emphasizes the importance of knowing in advance what you and your guests want. Are you planning an elegant affair, a bang-out party or something in between? If you want a specific band, or have specific tastes, you already have a good idea where to look, Zurin points out.

Most bands get their business from people who already know them. If they've been around a long time, they're probably legitimate, with plenty of experience and good references. Even so, read the whole contract before you sign, to avoid misunderstandings.

Zurin and Buchbinder agree there are different ways to assess the band. Hearing them at a party is good, but how will they sound at your event? On the other hand, if you hear a tape, you'll still want to know how they sound live.

Zurin advises looking for a diverse repertoire and a band leader who's open to fresh ideas. Also, look at the band's talent as a whole, more than individual musicians' excellence. They are there to provide fine dance music, so individual musicianship takes a back seat.

Buchbinder, for his part, distinguishes between a function band and a performance band. At most simchahs, the band is not the centre of attention. Its function is to play background music at dinner, and dance music later. Performers, on the other hand, are the centre of attention for a set or two.

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Band members must work well with each other, with other party professionals such as the caterer and videographer — and of course, with you. Consideration for your needs is paramount, but while you are the ultimate boss, you need input from the band leader to make things work well.

A good leader should radiate confidence. And though one of his tasks is to keep you comfortable, he should also be up front with you about unexpected developments (for example, if the lead guitarist takes ill, or a piece of equipment is not working).

Get value for your dollar, advises Zurin. Price shouldn't be a major factor, though it often is. Bands which seem too big can adapt for any affair or budget. A nine-piece band can compress into a trio, even a one-man band and a small group can expand for a special occasion.

Buchbinder and Zurin both recommend booking a year ahead, or earlier if you can. Dates such as prime summer Sundays go fast and besides, you need time to plan well.

Good DJs specialize in fun

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

Evan Aranoff of Kloda Productions (748-5282) advises you to be sure of what you want in a disc jockey.

Then, after some face-to-face meetings, pick one who listens to you. Look for courtesies and conveniences like 24-hour backup service and an emergency phone number. Rapport is even more vital.

Singers' playlist should appeal to all guests

Both Boris and Aelita put high value on versatility. A good singer can work well alone, or with any size band, from a duo or trio for an intimate gathering, to eight or 10 musicians for a gala — at every kind of event from formal to elegant, from private party to corporate function — and within any budget, be it lavish, modest or in between.

Hitting it off with you, though, is the key, according to both Boris and Aelita and developing good rapport can take several meetings. Your singer should consider your simchah important enough to prepare specially and the repertoire should be diverse, with something to appeal to every guest.

This special effort to please every guest makes for a successful party. The good feeling it creates for one person spreads to the others.

"Besides that," Aelita laughs, "learning songs in many different languages and styles keeps me versatile." The singer, she says, is the liaison between audience and orchestra.

Boris considers liaison essential to a successful event. Like the band leader, the singer must be an entertainer as much as an artist, with a feel for the composition and mood of the audience, and the ability to interact with them on and off stage.

A year, even a year and a half in advance, is not too early to book your singer, says Aelita. Boris emphasizes the importance of consulting with your singer a few weeks before the event, to make sure all the details are taken care of.

"We specialize in fun," says Aranoff and any good disc jockey should be able to say the same. Experience is an important factor and gives a company a track record but freshness, newness and readiness to innovate are essential too. Even the planning should be fun, and allow room to improvise.

Do you want a traditional DJ, or a total entertainment package? Kloda can provide sound, lighting, decor, interactive games, virtual reality, fun foods, and novelties like take-home wax impressions of your hand.

100 percent effort

Then too, every simchah has its own unique character. Do you want a DJ who is more low-key (for a wedding), or someone who puts on more of a show (for a bar/ bat mitzvah)? If it's an adult event, but with kids present, do you need separate entertainment?

A good DJ gives every event one hundred percent effort. He treats any event, whether it's a gala affair or a small party, as a once-in-a-lifetime occasion, always looking to make a good first impression. Find a disc jockey with this attitude, and you'll say afterwards: "a good time was had by all."

Before you hire a DJ, advises Bruce Citron of North American Disc Jockey Services (750-3750), meet the person the company will send to your event. Audition him at another venue — and if you like him, make sure his name is the one on your signed contract.

Also, look at the music list and make sure that what's on it is the same as what will be played at your party.

Get referrals from your friends. A reputable company will also provide a list of references. Usually, the technical aspect is not a problem, especially if you hire someone with experience. Rapport is just as important as technical expertise, yet harder to establish.

Even the best music is no good with a poor DJ and yet a good DJ can provide first-class entertainment even with limited equipment and music.

Thinking about the tone of your event, decide what you want your DJ to project. Should he be very animated, for example, or elegant and low-profile?

While some DJ's can act as MC's, and vice versa, they are not the same thing so make sure you are clear in your own mind about what you want. And book at least three months ahead, so you get the company and person you want.

Mr. DJ does more than just spin discs

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Total interactive entertainment is a fairly new idea; but it's catching on. Ed McMurtry of Mr DJ (905-886-4488) and Edwin Allen Productions, has pioneered this concept here, and has solid advice for anyone choosing an entertainment coordinator for a party.

Interactive theme parties are the most rewarding to create

You want everything to mesh well, but in the stress of preparing, you can overlook details. The coordinator minimizes stress, while making all the elements mesh so that everything feels natural. He is a Renaissance man, with an overview of everything from technical details like eliminating microphone feedback to getting everyone to work together to make your simchah a work of art.

Set your standards high, McMurtry urges. It's downright unacceptable, he says, for the caterer and the DJ to get into a tiff about timing; and even erstwhile competitors like DJs and live entertainers can cooperate amicably. Nor is this a matter of money. At high-end functions, total entertainment and perfect coordination have become a must, but you can have quality on a modest budget.

Of course, your coordinator should also be something of a diplomat. Every professional at your simchah, from florist to videographer, wants his or her art to shine, both out of professional pride and for the sake of referrals. The coordinator has to get top performance from all professionals, while making sure they work together well.

Don't assume that it's enough to spend money on even the best band, caterer, or other professional. Each stage of the party should flow into the next. A change in music tempo, for example, in the movement from eating to dancing, should feel like a natural shift.

The more diverse the crowd, the more variety to plan for. Where there are three generations present, for instance, as at a large wedding, you may want a juggler for the small kids, virtual reality for the adolescents and a dance band for the older generation.

In harmonizing all these elements, a good coordinator knows, for example, that you don't ask everyone to sit down to dinner before the parents of the bride and groom are at the head table; so he warns them — and the musicians or DJ — a little ahead of time, and makes sure they are seated first.

Interactive theme parties, says McMurtry, are the hardest to create — and the most rewarding. Nothing is more satisfying than for everyone to enjoy your event as if they were really part of West Side Story, or had spent an evening on a Greek island.

The more improbable the theme, the harder the work to make it plausible. Can you imagine an underwater theme, for example? What about transforming something as staid as a corporate awards presentation into an event so exciting the invitees, at the end of the evening, are looking forward to the next one? McMurtry's done it.

It's a demanding, fast-changing field. Choose someone who takes part in trade fairs and organizations like ISES (International Special Events Society), works with other professionals and does everything possible to do whatever is state-of-the-art in the field.

As to how far in advance to book, McMurtry identifies three variables: time, expense and quality. You can get high quality on a modest budget, but not on short notice; or high quality on short notice, but not on a low budget. In any case, best book as far ahead as you can, he says. This cuts stress and gives you and the coordinator time to spark the inspired ideas that will make your celebration one-of-a-kind.

Wedding gowns:

What's old is new again

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Wechsler (416-787-5768), who specializes in custom designed fashions, works out of a shop at 1912 Avenue Rd. She is often called upon to design more informal wedding gowns for her clients, she says.

Informal gowns and dresses are often chosen by older brides or those remarrying, she says "They tend to be more sophisticated. They want something more reflective of their personality."

She notes that there's a return to classic-style wedding gowns popular in the '40s and '50s. The look, which she calls the Grace Kelly cut, is characterized by cleaner lines, simple fitted bodices, short sleeves, narrow shoulders, boat necks and A-line or circle cut skirts

Wechsler says some first-time brides are also choosing to get married in pastel-colored rather than white dresses, which was also a trend in the '40s and '50s.

She works closely with her clients to find a look that suits them, she says. "Our specialty is working with clients on a one-on-one basis to develop a design that's personalized We customize it right down to the color."

She says she often uses a variety of materials – chantilly lace, silk crepe, silk satin, chiffon and/ or French lace – to create a texture look.

Before cutting a garment, the fabric is draped to the body, a technique which adds "fullness and softness without getting volume," Wechsler explains. "This allows the garment to silhouette the body without being fitted."

She says these days she's cutting many skirts on the bias because it gives the garment a slim line that is more flattering.

Popular among her clients are gowns made of layers of chiffon with a tunic style top, vests over chiffon tunics, and brocade and couture lace jackets over chiffon skirts.

Wechsler also creates a lot of dresses for mothers for whom she suggests "a more understated look."

Many brides come back to Wechsler to have their gowns dyed, for use for other occasions.

"We also do a lot of dying of shoes, hats and evening bags." She carries a full line of accessories including hats, head pieces and shoes.

Moda Sposa (905-882-8880) located at 7787 Yonge St. in Thornhill, is a traditional bridal shop offering a full range of wedding gowns, bridal accessories and bridesmaids dresses.

Shop owner Winnie Chin says bridal gowns are simpler and less embellished with fitted bodices, and there are also a lot of princess style or empire waist gowns.

An Adele Wechsler wedding gown.

She says designers are showing more short sleeve and sleeveless dresses with cap sleeves or halter style, as well as scoop necks. "There is an emphasis on the waist." As for trims, ribbon is being used on hems and veils while beading has been toned down, but some brides still ask for a very embellished look, she says.

Long trains are not as popular as they used to be because they are heavy, and a little cumbersome, Chin says.

Chin buys her dresses from many American designers with show rooms in Canada. Some of the lines she carries include Jim Hjelm, Galina, Bill Levkoff and Alfred Angelo. She also does custom work for brides "who can't find what they're looking for," she says.

Chin says bridesmaid dresses come in a wide array of colors, which include soft new colors like lavender, champagne and stone, and stronger colors like lilac and tangerine. Colors that continue to be very popular are navy, plum and chocolate.

Imagine giving your cousin a frame which incorporates pieces of her great-grandmother's china. Or giving your wife a decorative bowl which includes the key from your first home.

Margot Marcus, owner and originator of Margot's Smashing Designs (905-881-3565), handcrafts unique, customized mosaic giftware for bnai/bnot mitzvah, weddings, baby showers and other occasions.

Marcus makes picture frames, bowls, teapots and trinket boxes, using broken china, pottery, jewelry, keys or other sentimental items to enhance the design.

The mosaic pieces offer "an interesting, eye-catching, colorful, intriguing giftware item. The harder you look at it, the more interesting things you discover," she says.

The appeal of Marcus' designs is that the gifts are unique and personalized. For instance, when designing a frame for a bar or bat mitzvah, Marcus may include the name of the child and the date of the bar or bat mitzvah.

She says a frame for a bar or bat mitzvah would also include "Handmade clay pieces that would signify the occasion. That might be a Torah, a book, a Star of David or a chai."

Marcus says she also includes items that reflect the individual's interests or hobbies — "a computer, a hockey stick or ballet slippers. And these hand-made clay pieces are integrated into the mosaic," she says.

Marcus can color coordinate a frame to match an invitation or imitate the calligraphy in the working of the frame. Also, she can frame an invitation to commemorate a celebration.

Customers often bring the material to be used in the mosaic.

"They bring me something, whether it's a piece of china or a charm or a pin, that they want to have included and the mosaic becomes even more meaningful," she says.

Marcus believes that giving one of her designs "shows that you've taken the time and trouble to choose something that is completely fitting to that individual or that occasion.

"It's also something that they're not going to receive a duplicate of," she says.

Margot's Smashing Designs range from $20 to $250. For example, a five-by-seven frame is $45 plus tax, a teapot is $80, a trinket box is $30 and a candy dish is $18. Larger items, such as tables or mirrors are available, with the cost increasing proportionally to the size of the piece and the amount of work put in.

Professional photos ensure life-long memories

By STUART MOSCOE
Special to The CJN

After the cake has been eaten and the band has gone home, your photographs will bring back memories for years to come. It is therefore especially important to choose a photographer who will capture your family and friends on film for you to enjoy. Photography by a full-time professional will ensure that the images are produced properly, with care and attention to detail.

Expression is the most important part of the photograph. If the expression is pleasing, then the picture will be appreciated. Since your photographer must elicit positive expressions on numerous occasions throughout the photo session, a good rapport must exist between the photographer and his subjects.

Lighting must also be arranged with special care. With proper lighting, a photographer can emphasize your attractive features and minimize imperfections. The photographer may use natural light or electronic flash depending on the situation.

Your photographer may also use one or more lights. The use of multiple lights demands the use of triggering mechanisms to fire the auxiliary lights at the same time that the shutter is released.

Often clients say they don't want to look posed. This is because they have seen photos of large groups of people who have not been shown how to stand.

The background is the most underrated part of a photograph. Your photographer must be be able to choose an appropriate background for the photography and should discuss that choice with you before any photographs are taken. In this way, there will not be any unpleasant surprises.

Some locations don't lend themselves well to photographs. In these instances, your photographer should recommend using a painted canvas or muslin background. Before photos are taken, you should see samples made with this background to ensure that you like it.

People who do not like painted backgrounds should make their feelings known when they contract with the photographer so that a different location for the photography can be discussed. Locations in the Toronto area that look good in photographs include the University of Toronto, Sunnyside Pavilion, the Guild Inn and Alexander Muir Gardens. Another option is to have the photos done at the client's home.

Know who's shooting the pictures

Some studios have associate photographers who take the photos at the whole affair or at the reception. You should know the person who will take the pictures on your day and make sure you see his work before you contract with the studio.

The cost for photography should be about 10 to 20 percent of the overall budget for your affair. Remember, the cost usually takes into consideration other expenses, such as retouching and laminating or lacquer spraying your photographs (in order to protect them for many years).

Unfortunately, since most of the albums available here are imported from the United States, photography costs have jumped dramatically in the last few years as the Canadian dollar has fallen.

New styles have emerged in the last few years such as all-candid coverage with no posed pictures, fashion style coverage, black and white, sepia color and selective hand coloring of black and white images. Most studios can provide black and white, sepia color or selective hand coloring of black and white photographs.

The no posing/all candid method of photography is now becoming popular. The advantage is truly candid, photojournalistic coverage without the bother of having to pose for photographs. The disadvantage is that some people might be missed by the photographer. Candid coverage requires that your photographer shoot many pictures in order to capture everyone. Also, you will probably end up with a significantly larger album to accommodate all the extra photos.

Many couples are surprised to find out that some studios now offer wedding registration. Guests can then give photographs, albums and frames as gifts.

When choosing your photographer, check with family and friends to see if they have used the photographer in the past and if they were pleased with the results. In the end, a photographer should be hired because you like the quality of his work, his personality and the service he provides.

Adults can have a ball

Having fun is no longer just for the children

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

So you think kids just want to have fun? Check out some party places where adults can have a ball as well.

At the Ontario Science Centre (429-4100), guests can sit back in the new Shoppers Drug Mart OMNIMAX Theatre and enjoy more than 13,000 watts of wrap-around digital sound and images, placing viewers right in the middle of the 24-metre dome screen.

After the screening, you can hold a reception at the new Novopharm Lobby, recently designed by architect Eb Zeidler. Don't worry about the number of guests – the lobby can accommodate from 20 – 1,200 people.

By hosting an event throughout the Ontario Science Centre, you and your guests have access to over 800 exhibits, programs and live demonstrations. People can stroll through a rain forest, test their fast ball or try out the computers.

At one series of interactive exhibits, guests become the forensic investigator, examining a simulated crime and helping the police find the suspect. Housing staff is always available to perform demonstrations and several locations can be set up throughout the building for food and beverages.

If it's an elegant setting you're after, try the two-storey Procter & Gamble Great Hall. With a capacity of 400, the hall has floor to ceiling windows and overlooks the Don Valley. Also available is the brand-new banquet hall, the Imperial Oil Auditorium with full audio-visual capabilities, the S.C. Johnson Wax, Canadian Pacific and Compaq theatres, or a variety of board and meeting rooms.

Guests can lose themselves in cyberspace when they attend a party at the Electric Bean (481-2100), a cyberspace cafe at Yonge and Eglinton, full of Internet-friendly computers, play stations and virtual reality pods. Would-be skiers can swish and swoosh down the slopes in the virtual reality of the Alpine Racer or cowboys can become top-gun fighters in Terminal Velocity. Chat rooms can also be set up with chatters from around the world.

Several different types of parties can be arranged at the Electric Bean. A small group, of 20 people or fewer, can meet in the classroom, a private, enclosed room. The space is suitable for training classes, workshops, product demonstrations and launches, boardroom meetings and special interest groups.

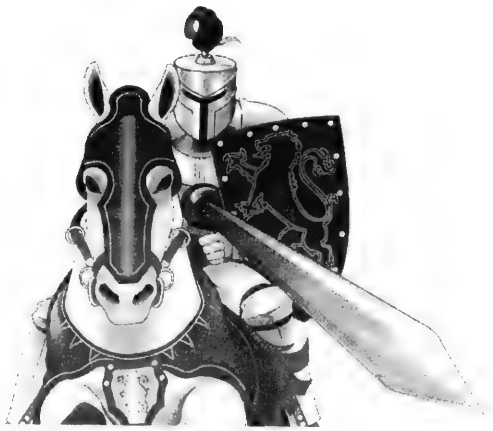
When hosts rent the Atrium and the classroom, guests enjoy an intimate meeting place and a spacious mingling area. The Atrium, an open area that can accommodate up to 60 people, is perfect for catered events and parties.

The Ground Floor is a unique space for the ultimate cyber-event. Reserve up to 50 computers connected to a dedicated line for Internet access and everyone is set for the evening. Instructors are available on request for all types of gatherings and computers can be customized.

Guests are transported back to the 11th century when they party at Medieval Times Dinner & Tournament (260-1234), featuring knights and elegant horsemanship. The Toronto Castle, which opened in 1993 in the former Arts, Crafts & Hobbies Building, Exhibition Place, was transformed into a castle with a ceremonial area seating 1,350 people.

The program begins the moment guests enter. They are greeted by the Count of Perelada and his countess who preside over the banquet, games and tournament.

Each guest receives a color-coded crown corresponding to their champion knight who represents them during the ceremonial procession, medieval games and battles.



Guests enter the Hall of Arms where authentic medieval artifacts are displayed. These include the crests and coat of arms of many European families, plus suits of armor and weaponry. Everyone loves seeing Andalusian stallions in their display stalls.

During the feast, (kosher food is available), displays of horsemanship are performed, followed by jousting and battles to the death. The winning knight then has the honor of choosing his queen of love and beauty. After the two-hour show, guests can dance in the Knight Club. General admission is $41.95 for adults and $26.95 for children 12 and under, and group rates are available for 15 or more people.

Enjoy innovative contemporary cuisine combined with personal service and flawless attention to detail when you make a party at The Sutton Place Hotel (324-6430).

"The hotel works closely with GMB Caterers to customize kosher events and it has hosted everything from seders to bris ceremonies," says Lori Cooper, public relations manager.

Parties can be arranged to suit every budget, she says, "and hosts can choose items which are important to them for their special birthday, anniversary, engagement or wedding including a tailor-made menu, three-tiered wedding cake or a spacious honeymoon suite."

Large parties can be held at Stop 33 ballroom which features a panoramic view of Toronto's skyline or the Queen Victoria and Royal Sutton ballrooms. Other, smaller rooms are ideal for parties from 10 to 300 people.

Get your videos shot by pros

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Think again before you ask Uncle Harry to videograph your simchah, says Brian Korson.

The owner of Video Excellence Productions (905-731-4355) says that it may sound like a great way to save money, but the job will just not get done properly.

"Family members get caught up in the activities and forget to take certain shots or else they take too much floor and ceiling.

"A professional videographer remains detached and they know the key things to capture ahead of time. Before the party begins, a professional will have discussed with the hosts the type of shots they are looking for – tables, lots of dancing, guest reactions."

Korson, who recently acquired a new digital camera and editing suite, says that video packages can be arranged to suit most budgets.

"The digital package does cost a little more but it significantly improves the picture's sharpness and colors are more vibrant," he says.

Videos can be "dressed up as little or as much as desired. We can add animation, shots of the bride and groom growing up, highlight summaries of the wedding day, guest credits – there is no end to what we can do."

Evan Trestan, who owns Images International (977-5575) with Shay Schwartzman, agrees that it is "not fair to give the job of videographing to a relative. An uncle needs to be a guest. A videographer's sole job is to capture the event."

He says that his company uses A/B roll editing which is used to dissolve live images. "This is effective in flashbacks, shots between the homes of the bride and groom or between speakers. It gives the video a creative air."

Guests love it

He also works to most budgets and says that packages range from merely shooting an event with little editing done, to the "full blown-package with two cameras and a jumbo 10 ft. x 12 ft. screen.

"What we do with the screen is compile photographs, home video clips and video greetings from the guests and put them all together. We then play it on the screen and it becomes part of the evening's entertainment. The guests just love it.

"Once the giant screen is there, we can also provide live-eye feed and guests can see the whole party. It works just great for speeches or the first dance – it really gives the party a grand feeling," he says.

"During the party we remain as inobtrusive as possible. All our equipment is on remote control and there are no cables on the floor. We also use wireless mikes so speeches sound much clearer. With a mike on the podium, the sound comes from there, rather than from a speaker."

Korson suggests viewing various sample packages before picking one. "Check out videos of various types of affairs, different locations as well as dressed up and scaled-down versions. Make sure, before choosing a videographer, that all his work is professional, despite what package you've chosen."

Leave party planning to the pros

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The date is set, the hall is reserved but you just don't know where to go from there. Call Karen Garscadden or Karen Jacobs of Up & Coming Events (905-886-8148). They'll steer you in the right direction.

The pair, in business for nine years "coordinates family or corporate parties, special events, product launches, grand openings or any good old time. We help make the party," says Garscadden.

"At the first meeting [with our client] we start from scratch. It's not our job at that point to give answers, but rather to ask a lot of questions. Do you want something traditional or funky? Is it going to be casual or black-tie? Are there a lot of young kids coming or a bunch of teenagers? All these things impact on our plans."

It is then, she says that they take the interview a step further and decide if the hosts want a themed party or any extra entertainment.

Short cut

"We can arrange for bands, DJs, florists, photographers — any party professional. We can even design invitations and work directly with the printers. In other words, we can take the party from step one until all plans are complete."

Garscadden knows how important it is to stay within budget and she knows which professionals provide basic services.

"We give our clients a short-cut in putting their party together. I save people from shopping around by recommending professionals who work within certain a price range. Sometimes a client needs a small idea just to tie the party together. That is OK too.

"We have resources at our fingertips. We can work with decorators or prop designers to create a desired effect. We don't create the work but we do create the ideas and coordinate efforts with the party designer. A combination of our creative skills and their technical skills makes for a great party."

One of their most memorable parties was a 50th birthday. "Everything from the give-aways to the music was from the '50s and the guests came dressed in themed clothes such as poodle skirts. We even had a hula hoop contest."

At a cottage party, guests were sent T-shirts with the invitation and were asked to wear them to the party. "Some people decorated their T-shirts and some wore them plain. They loved the casual atmosphere."

Someone from their staff is always at the party to make sure it is running smoothly, says Garscadden. "People have big parties once or twice in their lifetime and we want to make sure they are happy."

A treat for all Montreal Wannabees

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The special flavor of Montreal has come to Toronto, with Levitts Kosher Food outlet, on Alness Drive in North York.

Knishes, pickles and frozen challahs are just a few of the treats that former Montrealers and Montreal wannabees can get to give their parties that zing.

Knishes, which are not fried but baked, come in different varieties, like pizza, spinach, potato and kasha. Cocktail-size knishes are especially nice for entertaining, said operations manager Mona Pasternak.

Smoked turkeys are a nice touch, and can be ordered whole or in quarters. They come vacuum packed, to preserve freshness. Levitts also has lamb patties, frozen steaks, deli meat in bulk, and of course hot dogs and hamburgers for the barbecue.

Great Montreal Bagels

"We even have Montreal hot dog and hamburger buns, and those great Montreal bagels," Pasternak said.

For those who don't want meat, Pasternak suggests fish: smoked salmon, salmon, mackerel, trout, whitefish or carp, all prepared by Levitts in Montreal.

Levitts offers one-stop shopping for a party. Besides their own products, they can supply salads, paper goods and baked goods. "We have pareve brownies that are to die for, they are so chocolatey," Pasternak said.

It is best to give a week's notice, she said, to ensure the best service and selection.

Levitts is at 791 Alness, west of Dufferin between Steeles and Finch. It is open six days a week, including Sunday. Telephone 416-665-5224.

Laser Quest:
Next century's hide and seek

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

The kids don their power pac, enter the black-lit, 6,000-square-foot maze immersed in fog and have 30 seconds before the shooting begins.

Kids arrive, choose a code name and are taken to a briefing room where they learn the rules and recite the code of honor – no running, no offensive language and always play fair, play hard and play to survive.

The computer-generated power pac, which keeps score of how many times a player is shot or has shot another player, vibrates when someone is tagged and is deactivated for five seconds. Mirrors hang throughout the maze so laser beams are accentuated and there are windows through which players can shoot others on different levels.

"Throughout the 20-minute game, a player can be tagged any number of times so no one sits out," she says.

Birthday party packages include two 20-minute Laser Quest admissions per child, a 2-for-1 pass per person redeemable on a future date, a Laser Quest gift for the birthday child and a private party room.

"The arcade room keeps the kids busy in between games and we also have our front of the house fun, which may feature a magician or face painting. The kids have no down-time at all," Carrol says.

Children do not have a monopoly at Laser Quest. "Many parents and grandparents who come just to watch their kids, find themselves playing as well. More often than not, the kids beat them."

Corporate packages are also available and groups of up to 30 people can rent the playing field for two or three games. The entire Laser Quest facility can be reserved for private parties of about 50 people or more.

any age but says that kids under four or five years old do not understand the concept of magic.

"If [the show] is for younger children, I don't do card tricks. There's other stuff, there's more live, vibrant, colorful things and a lot more silliness and wackiness".

However, his performances aren't only for children. He says adults often think a magician is for the kids. "But you know what? Adults really like magic."

Palter, who has been a magician for 17 years and a ventriloquist for 14 years, has performed on CITYTV's Breakfast Television, entertained guests at a Maccabi Canada hockey team event and performed at Toronto's Ginsberg & Wong Restaurant.

He became interested in magic at nine years of age, when his uncle gave him a magic set. He says he loves watching someone walk away after he has performed, laughing, entertained and happy.

He is different from other magicians, he says, because he interacts with the audience. "I talk to them. I will be grabbing the microphone, talking and interacting and being a lot more light-hearted".

Palter also performs for corporate events, including trade exhibitions and conferences. He says that at trade shows, magic tricks are a good way to attract people to a booth.

"I use magic as a medium to sell. I will customize your product, your slogan, your idea, whatever it is into some sort of magical effect.

"You've got to be different. You've got to hold people's attention. You've got to grab them and you've got to hold on and people are finding tons of different ways to do it," he says.

Palter says he finds it thrilling to entertain. "I can't describe that feeling of euphoria after I've been to a table and [everyone is] happy."

Decorative ketubah a work of art

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When artist Howard Fox asked his first cousin what he wanted for a wedding gift some 15 years ago, he suggested that Fox make a ketubah for him.

Fox says he was surprised by the request. "I thought you had to be a rabbi or a sofer. So I looked into it. Anyone can make a ketubah."

He found some books on the ketubah and when he discovered its long tradition as a decorative ceremonial art piece, he became enthusiastic, he recalls. "I taught myself to do the Hebrew calligraphy."

His first ketubah, a water color, led to other commissions, he says. "My cousin loved it. And when other people saw it, I got more orders. All of a sudden I was busy making ketubahs."

Fox also began selling ketubahs — he does both water color and lithographs — to local Judaica galleries and then to galleries and Judaica stores across North America.

"I get couples who want to identify [with their Jewish heritage] in some way. The ketubah is an aspect for culturally identifying," he says. "The ketubah offers a nice way of having Jewish-related art. It acts as both art and a ceremonial piece."

Today, Fox lives in Tel Aviv with his wife and young son, but stresses that he continues to work for the North American market. Decorative ketubahs are not popular in Israel, he says.

A renewal of interest

He notes that the decorative ketubah has always flourished wherever Jewish communities have felt secure and thrived economically, such as in Florence, in Persia and in Spain before the Inquisition.

Given the precarious existence of the Jews in Northern and Eastern Europe, Fox says, the concept of art was "trivial in the face of their struggle to survive. These communities were neither secure nor wealthy. They couldn't support the artists culturally or economically."

He points out that there has been a renewal of interest in the ketubah in the United States and Canada because the North American Jewish communities have thrived economically, politically and culturally.

"There's a renaissance in Judaica here," he says.

The decorative ketubah in North America began making its comeback in the late '60s and has become very popular since the economic boom of the mid '80s, Fox says. "People became aware and now it's become fashionable to have a nice ketubah."

Fox's ketubahs can be found at Matana Judaica, 248 Steeles Ave.W.; and at Israel's, the Judaica Centre, 441 Clarke Ave. in Thornhill and 897 Eglinton Ave. W.

Fox is also represented by the company, Ketubah Ketubah, operated by Michael Shapiro (924-4995).

Shapiro, who has an MBA in marketing, worked for the corporate giant Procter & Gamble before venturing on his own. The corporate work was a great training ground for learning business strategy, he says.

And while he knew he wanted to run his own business in a creative field, he didn't really know what he wanted to do. After leaving Procter & Gamble for an extended trip to Israel, he met some ketubah artists.

"I found there were many people who wanted ketubahs and so many wonderful artists doing great work.

And yet is was often difficult for people to find the ketubah that they were looking for."

And so Shapiro set up his company, Ketubah Ketubah, two years ago to market ketubahs internationally, helping buyers from all over the world find the ketubah of their choice. He advertises throughout the United States and Canada, attends Jewish conventions and makes use of the Internet as a marketing tool.

"I recognized that the Internet would be the perfect vehicle to make the ketubah easily available to Jews everywhere... Many of my customers are in places with smaller Party decoration includes everything from place cards, centrepieces and floral arrangements to chocolate smash cakes. With all this variety, however, there are common elements to consider in choosing decorations — and the decorator.

More to decorations than meets the eye

No matter how good the food tastes and the music sounds, Mira Shimkovich of Perlit Novelties (665-4838) says, the visual aspect is just as vital to a successful event.

Mario Seguin of Floral Studio (504-1850) says that although much of the work is done in advance, the ultimate test is the simchah itself. Flowers, for example, must harmonize with gown fabrics: the purity of satin demands colors, textures and arrangements different from the sensuality of silk.

Bob Levine of Chocolate Charm (787-4256) notes that people want novelty, as well as elegance and sophistication.

Seguin agrees. Decor today is not just ordered from a catalogue, but created in a studio to fit the occasion and the tastes of hosts and guests. The decor is your personal statement, he says. So before consulting a decorator, have an idea of what you want.

Look for someone with a unique, individual style, who enjoys artistic work, Shimkovich advises. But, Seguin says, remember that the decorator's art is at your service. Find someone you have rapport with, learn how they work, make sure they know what you want and then give them room to do it. Levine says his best ideas often come from clients, but also recommends that you listen carefully to your decorator.

Versatility is an asset

Versatility is an asset, says Shimkovich, especially if you want something out of the ordinary. For example, a specialist in invitations who also does other things like centrepieces may have more interesting ideas and a wider range of products.

Price is a factor too, she adds, but a competent decorator can work within any budget.

Someone who's been in business for several years, Levine notes, will have time to build a track record and reference list, but experience should be balanced by readiness to innovate and openness to new trends.

Referrals from friends, consultants and other professionals can help you choose. Decorators network with their colleagues and other party professionals at venues like trade fairs and in their everyday contacts and they get to know each other.

Book well in advance, advises Shimkovich, up to a year, and avoid last-minute rushes. Usually, says Levine, a few weeks is OK, but book farther in advance if you want a number of more unusual things.

In choosing flowers, Seguin says, reserve popular types up to a year before the simchah, and choose seasonal species if possible. The more complex the arrangement and the less seasonal the flowers, the farther in advance to book, even though the new-style florist does carry a wide variety in great abundance.

One-stop party shopping

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to the CJN

As planning a function gets more complicated, the arguments in favor of a one-stop party supply house grow more compelling. Why not find all your supplies under one roof, from custom stationery to color-co-ordinated decorations, and not have to schlep all over town?

There may be party favors or keepsakes you want from a specialty house. You'll find, though, that the one-stop suppliers not only have a huge variety of goods themselves, they also network with specialty suppliers for niche markets.

You can always have more than what you see on the shelves. If you ask for something the supplier doesn't have in stock, he probably knows someone who does.

Both Mark Springall of Lightworks (416-665-3329) and Lance Stewart of Party Giant (905-477-1903) agree that networking with colleagues is essential to providing the best products and service. The various firms do compete but the competition is friendly because to serve you well, they have to help each other.

Often, a reputable firm not only supplies items to party hosts, but also professionals such as DJs, party consultants or hall managers. Consequently, in choosing your supplier, a referral from a party professional is as good as one from a friend.

Springall says with all the new products coming on the market, searching out the stock for his shelves is the hardest part of his job. At the same time, he calls it the most enjoyable. Adults can regain their own childhood sense of fun, when they choose supplies for a bar or bat mitzvah.

Nowadays, neon necklaces, raindrop tiaras, inflatable guitars and saxophones, and items that react under black light are in. But a good party supplier, besides following trends, will help find something that makes your son or daughter's simchah stand out from everyone else's.

A lot of variables

One-step shopping does not mean one-time customers. Springall and Stewart both ascribe most of their business to referrals and repeat business comes from honesty and long-term rapport.

Is your supplier, for example, ready to advise you against buying too much? Is he flexible — willing to procure, for example, any quantity of party hats from one to 1,000?

Stewart ranks service as high as product. For this reason, he advises making sure your supplier assigns one person to work specially with you, and provide continuity. If it's a bar mitzvah, for example, this consultant should sit down and talk with you, to ascertain your son's likes and dislikes, and help you make his simchah unique.

You have to deal with a lot of variables in planning a party, Stewart points out. For the party supplier, like any other professional, service means keeping track of details and working well with people such as caterers and organizers, keeping the unpredictable to a minimum.

Another aspect of service is objectivity. A one-stop supplier will have an overview of details, and may notice things you miss. Stewart cites the example of a customer choosing patterned tablecloths which detracted from the patterns of the dishes. The supplier suggested plain cloths and the customer was pleased to see that the dishes showed better.

Springall recommends choosing your supplier four to six weeks in advance. Stewart advises at least two to four weeks, depending on what kind of event. Both agree, though, that a good firm will handle special orders and rush priorities as well.

Flowers are good for you

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Florist Jerry Smierzchalski says there's nothing like flowers to brighten one's day. Smierzchalski, owner of Dozen Roses (256-2527) at 3503 Bathurst St. in North York and 3227 Eglinton Ave. E. in Scarborough says flowers are suitable for all kinds of occasions because they cheer people up.

In fact, he says he recalls hearing a lecture by a well-known American physician who tells people to buy themselves flowers because they're uplifting and therefore good for one's health.

Smierzchalski says he began to decorate for weddings, bar mitzvahs and other simchahs at the request of customers shopping for fresh flowers in his shop. That aspect of the business, he adds, has grown significantly through word of mouth.

He says people really love the way Dozen Roses presents its flowers. "I work with superb designers. They make unique arrangements and creations."

He offers his customers reasonable prices along with a huge selection of flowers, particularly roses, he says. "We specialize in roses. We carry 20 to 30 different kinds of roses yet we have excellent prices because of the volume we sell."

Roses are popular for any occasion, but there are certain varieties, such as the pale peach-colored osiana and the cream-colored ariana, which are in high demand for weddings, as well as exotic flowers like haliconias and birds of paradise for the head table and sweet table arrangements, Smierzchalski notes.

He says the centrepieces for the dinner tables at weddings tend to be more traditional — generally a round vase with a candle — but his designers have also created some interesting and unusual arrangements using floating candles.

Sylvia Kaburovski of Flowers by Sylvia (905-889-1383) also prides herself on creating original and beautiful arrangement for special occasions and simchahs.

"Our prices are very reasonable," she says. "We give a lot of extras. We always add extra volume, using more flowers in our arrangements."

She says her showroom, located at 100 West Beaver Creek # 20 in Richmond Hill, is open to the public six days a week and she offers daily delivery, as far as Oshawa and Hamilton, of fresh, dry, and silk flowers, as well as baby and other gift baskets.

Flowers by Sylvia is affiliated with the Teleflora, a worldwide wire service, and American Floral Services (AFS) on the Internet. She also has a toll-free line (1-888-845-0550).

Kaburovski, who has been in the floral business for 15 years, says that she likes to use spring flowers like tulips in her centrepiece arrangements as well as gerbera, "a daisy that looks like velvet, and freesia with its multi-colors and lovely scent."

To create a festive mood at evening affairs, she creates topiary trees, floral towers and candelabras, often using roses, orchids and cala lilies, flowers, particularly popular for weddings, she says.

For weddings, arches decorated with flowers are also coming back into style, she says, but the decor in sanctuaries tends to be simple; tulle with an ivy trail is used for the aisles, along with two large arrangements on either side of the chupah or altar.

She also recommends arrangements with spray roses, a mini-rose that "looks very festive," as well as substituting limoneum, a white or purple flowet, for the more traditional baby's breath.

Kaburovski says she gives personal consultation before a simchah and she is on hand with a crew to set up the room. She says she is proud that "we put a lot of care into our work."

Strong competition means choices for consumers

By ERIC LAYMAN

There are plenty of party rental firms — there may even seem to be too many. Choosing among a few can be easy, especially with referrals from friends to guide you. Choosing among a few dozen is harder.

This wide range of choices, however, is good. Besides offering more variety of product, it means that the suppliers vie with one another in meeting a higher standard of service. To take full advantage of the increased competition, though, you have to be well-informed.

Of course, range and quality of supplies are important, so are familiarity with current trends and styles of decor. However, both Fern Blustein of Aurora Party Rentals (905-773-7706) and Dennis Higgins of Higgins Party Rentals (416-241-8564) place equally high value on intangibles such as honesty and customer rapport. "You can mass-produce the plates on the table," says Blustein, "but not the service."

Rapport builds trust, and takes much of the stress and worry out of party planning, so choose someone you feel comfortable working with. People's tastes vary greatly and they attach importance to different factors such as decor. Only a supplier who takes the trouble to get to know you can satisfy your wishes.

For this rapport to develop, your rental supplier should enjoy dealing with people. Blustein says that one of the great pleasures of her business is the thanks she gets after a successful event.

She adds that someone who has been in the rental business full-time for some years is your best bet. They will have experience, which is vital in estimating variables like the number of guests, and how many extra items you should have on hand.

A well-established firm also has a track record and referrals, so that you will find it easier to assess the quality of service you can expect.

Both Blustein and Higgins recommend looking for a firm which networks with other firms. That way, if you want something which that company doesn't have, it can get it for you elsewhere. Such a firm will also have experience co-ordinating its work with the other party professionals.

Blustein and Higgins attach great importance to timing, punctuality and organization. This entails planning well ahead, and offering services such as day-before delivery when needed. It makes it easier to deal with changes on short notice.

Look for an all-round, one-stop firm. Not only does it save time, it's much easier to co-ordinate your decor if you get all your tables, chairs, dishes, glasses and linen in one place.

Call at least a month before your simchah, Blustein advises, and give yourself time to develop rapport with your supplier.

Higgins advises giving yourself a month to six weeks for an average party or family gathering, several months or even a year for a wedding. The more time you allow, the less worry you will have to deal with.

Spotlight

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jessica Backal Myers, public relations coordinator for the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRC) of Toronto, has a big job cut out for her.

Myers, 30, a graduate of English and communications from York University, would like to see the Russian community become a vital part of Toronto Jewish life.

"With a population of 30,000, Russians are one of the biggest identifiable Jewish groups in Toronto, but for the most part, they have kept to themselves.

"People need to understand, however, that they were brought up in a stifling regime. Living there, they learned to trust very few people and now they are hesitant to reach out and be included because they have been hurt so much. They need to see that the Jewish community accepts them and Toronto, in turn, needs to see the JRC as a valuable resource. We are all Jews and we need to stress unity."

Myers says she would like to see Russians attend more Jewish programs and do volunteer work. "They need to come out of their shell and incorporate themselves into the community."

Born in Mexico and brought up in Toronto attending a Reform temple, Myers and her husband, parents of two young boys and expecting a third child, are baalei tshuvah.

"I feel like I am connected to different groups — I can feel the pulse on different sides and I realize that to be part of a community, one cannot remain isolated," she says.

Part of her mandate, she says, is to keep Russian youth in the community. "I need to encourage them to attend such things as our High Holy Day or youth programs. I want them to see the relevancy of the JRC in their lives. The JRC also needs their help."

As event coordinator of such things as the Chanukah candle-lighting ceremony at Mel Lastman Square, Purim carnival and banquet, Pesach seders and an upcoming gala fundraiser, Myers says she is trying to find the JRC "its place in the community. It is Russian first and foremost, but it wants to be seen as a viable organization that can help out in general."

Myers, who held several jobs in private industry before joining the JRC, says, "I love working in the Jewish community. When [my husband and I] were becoming baalei tshuvah, people helped us a lot. Working here, I feel that I can give something back."

The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto (JRC) is planning its Gala Concert '97 featuring Canadian tenor Michael Burgess, June 22 at Ford Centre for the Performing Arts.

The gala is a fundraiser for the JRC, an organization that provides education, counselling and social programs for the over 30,000 Russian Jews in Toronto.

Money raised will go to support such programs as adult Torah classes, lectures, daycare, preschool, Hebrew school and High Holiday and Shabbat services.

Also featured in the gala concert will be Israeli musician Yoel Sharabi and Toronto's Nafshenu Orchestra with a special guest appearance by French violinist Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Concert co-chairs are Leon Aram and Valentin Simanovsky.

Philanthropist issues challenge to help Vancouver Hillel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

VANCOUVER — Morris Wosk has issued a challenge to the entire city of Vancouver, one that will pay off with interest for the city's B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation.

For the campus organization's 50th anniversary this year, Wosk, president and chief executive officer of M.J. Investments Co. and Liberty Investments Ltd., has pledged to match community contributions to Hillel to a maximum of $500,000.

So far the campaign has achieved more than half its goal, with about $350,000, he reported in a recent telephone interview. "I'm sure we'll reach the quota, [but] I told them I would extend it another year if necessary."

A longtime Jewish community leader who has lived in Vancouver for some seven decades, Wosk donated $250,000 in the mid-1980s toward the renovation of Hillel House at the University of British Columbia.

Wosk and his son Mordehai, former executive director of Hillel House (1987-90) and current president of the Vancouver Hillel Endowment Foundation, are being honored at Hillel's 50th anniversary gala dinner (now sold out) being held June 17 at the Four Seasons Hotel.

"It's very important for the Jewish kids to have a home away from home," said Wosk. "I figured if we set up a fund for a million dollars, then they would have the interest from the money every year, and the fund would keep on growing in the future."

Jewish studies expands at Waterloo, York

WATERLOO — Starting next fall, students from across Canada will be able to learn about the experiences of Jewish people living among non-Jews throughout the ages.

Two new courses on Jewish studies will be launched in a collaborative effort involving York University's Centre for Jewish Studies and the University of Waterloo's Dean of Arts Advisory Committee on Jewish Studies.

Students will soon be able to enrol in the introductory courses, which will be available through Waterloo's distance education program, one of the largest in Canada. A distance eduction calendar listing the courses will be out this spring.

"We are convinced that there's a lot of interest in Jewish studies," said Prof. Paul Socken, chair of the Waterloo University advisory committee. "These two courses are both comprehensive and accessible to the non-Jewish students as well. This is the first time that Jewish studies courses will be available beyond the borders of a university campus, thanks to distance education."

Called the Jewish Experience: Symbiosis and Rejection, the courses explore the interaction of Jews and gentiles in selected periods from antiquity through the Middle Ages to today, including the relationship between Jews and Arabs. They will be taught by Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies. All texts will be read in English.

Socken said eventually the inter-university collaboration will lead to the offering of two Hebrew language courses by distance education.

The courses are part of a plan to establish a chair in Jewish Studies at Waterloo, he said. A $2-million fundraising campaign is under way to fund the chair.

At Waterloo, the program will be different from others in that it will be primarily for non-Jewish students, as well as offering courses through the distance education program. It will take a wide-ranging approach so that Jewish civilization in all its diverse expressions can be studied and developed as part of a comprehensive program. There will be a focus on the impact of Judaism on world history and religion and on the relationship between Jewish culture and Western civilization.

The Jewish studies program will be part of a religious studies and humanities option at Waterloo. It will offer students opportunities to understand the relationship between Jewish culture and disciplines such as history, philosophy, art and literature.

WJCC cuts funding to some beneficiaries

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite an increase of $65,000 earmarked for local needs in the 1996-97 Combined Jewish Appeal (CJA) campaign, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) is cutting allocations to two of its three major beneficiaries.

While Jewish Child & Family Service will be receiving about $1,000 more, the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and the new Jewish Community Campus are receiving significantly less.

At $2.96 million, the campaign raised about the same amount as the year before. The increase in contributions to the local community was balanced by a decrease in funds given to Israel.

CJA director Gerry Koffman attributes the cuts in allocations to lower interest rates on investments, transition costs in moving the community institutions to the new Asper Jewish Community Campus (which is opening in a few weeks) and the addition of a new beneficiary — the Jewish Museum of Western Canada – to open this year on the Campus. The museum is to receive $60,000.

The new Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre has received the largest cutback in allocations. This year, the centre is being granted $261,750 as compared to $319,374 last year, an 18 percent decrease. This is despite the fact that the centre is supposed to be offering expanded programming.

"We are hopeful that a large increase in membership at the new location will make up the difference in income for the centre," says Beth Goldberg, the WJCC's vice-president for budgeting and allocations. "If there is a shortfall, we will have to deal with it."

While appreciative of WJCC support and aware of the financial considerations it has to deal with, JCC president Barry Steinfeld expresses disappointment at the extent of the cutback.

"We will have to leave three full-time staff positions vacant until we see how things go," he says. "The community has to rally around Campus and support it if this institution is to survive and flourish."

The BJE is seeing its funding drop from $560,000 to $517,714. That includes $30,000 for a new resource centre/Jewish Public Library. BJE president Dr. Eric Winograd says the deficit will be dealt with by holding off buying new equipment. He vows that neither staffing nor programming will be affected.

Goldberg's budget and allocations committee is strongly recommending that ways be found to improve the CJA campaign. Koffman reports that he and his staff are currently undertaking strategic planning to try to determine how best to get across to people that the CJA is not just a "collection agency."

"We have to maintain contacts with our donors throughout the year," he says. "We also have to find ways to cultivate more people to drive the campaign and we have to better show our appreciation for our workers and contributors."

Holocaust play garners honors

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The two young authors of Everyone Has a Name, a play about the Holocaust, and the play's 15-year old leading actress have received regional recognition.

Alana Vertlieb and Niduk Wijayasingha won the award of excellence for writing and Samatha Waxman the award of merit for acting at the recent south-western Ontario high school drama festival in Windsor.

All three are students at Parkdale High School in Dundas, Ont. They were thrilled with their awards but also, as Vertlieb said, "kind of surprised."

Everyone Has a Name was Parkdale's entry in the Sears High School Drama Festival in Hamilton earlier this year, where it was named outstanding production and also earned the excellence in acting award for Waxman.

In Windsor, the play competed against 270 plays, coming fourth in the overall competition. Only the first three will go on to the finals in Kingston later this spring.

The play is about an elderly survivor, played by Waxman, who tells her children about her happy pre-war childhood, as well as her bitter memories of the Holocaust.

Vertlieb, a participant in the March of the Living two years ago, conceived the play as her way of teaching young people about the Holocaust, the best way, as she told the recent Yom Hashoah gathering here, she felt she could express the emotions she felt on that trip to Auschwitz and Birkenau.

The play can be seen in Toronto on June 8 at 7:30 p.m. at the Factory Theatre, 125 Bathurst Street at Adelaide. Admission is $5 per person. For tickets call 416-504-9971. The performance is sponsored by the March of the Living.

Collins reinforces stereotyping: scholar

By ROBERTA STALEY
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Columnist Doug Collins reinforces anti-Semitic stereotypes that manifest themselves in mainstream society, a Montreal scholar testified at the columnist's human rights hearing.

"The column in question specifically reinforces several well known and well-documented anti-Semitic stereotypes," said McGill University sociology professor Morton Weinfeld, who spoke at the quasi-judicial B.C. Human Rights Tribunal hearing into whether Collins' writings exposed Jews to hatred and contempt.

"The column essentially accuses Jews of being dishonest and untrustworthy (note the provocative epithet Swindler's List), of being motivated mainly by greed and money, of controlling the media and Hollywood, and of using the media for deliberate 'Jewish' objectives," said Weinfeld, who chairs the Canadian Ethnic Studies program at McGill University.

These stereotypes "would clearly make employers wary of employing Jews for sensitive positions demanding loyalty and trust. They are the kind of stereotype which would reinforce a glass ceiling against Jewish employees," said Weinfeld, who testified as an expert witness.

Lawyer David Sutherland, who is representing Collins and the North Shore Free Press Ltd., cross-examined Dr. Weinfeld. He said that "Jews have fared reasonably well economically and in terms of advancement in many professions and pursuits."

Weinfeld countered that there are more subtle effects from stereotyping.

The hearing is looking into a complaint by the Canadian Jewish Congress that 76-year-old Collins contravened the B.C. Human Rights Code, which prohibits the public expression of hate messages likely to expose a person or group to hatred or contempt.

The tribunal will also hear arguments about whether the relevant section of the Code violates the Charter of Rights and Freedoms' guarantee of free speech.

The complaint was filed in response to a March 9, 1994, North Shore News column by Collins titled Hollywood Propaganda, in which he referred to the movie Schindler's List as Swindler's List. He predicted it would win an Academy Award because "what happened to the Jews during the Second World War is not only the longest lasting but also the most effective propaganda exercise ever." He also called the Holocaust death toll of six million Jews "nonsense."

The hearing was considerably more sedate than the raucous support shown May 12 at the start of the inquiry. Collins' contingent of 100-plus supporters, many of whom disrupted the first hearing by shouting, groaning or marching around the room with signs, were absent.

Only a handful of spectators, including two security guards and a police officer, were present at the hearing. One onlooker was Lionel Kenner, who has battled Collins on a different front. A retired Simon Fraser University philosophy professor, Kenner filed a complaint with the B.C. Press Council several years ago, contending Collins' articles showed flagrant disregard for the truth when the columnist took issue with conventional views respecting the Holocaust. The council, a watchdog group which mediates complaints from the public against daily and community newspapers in British Columbia, partly upheld Kenner's complaint in 1995.

The 73-year-old Kenner told the Bulletin during a break in proceedings that legislation such as Section 2 is needed to ensure individual rights are not compromised by freedom of the press. "The press council supported the telling of lies," Kenner said.

BB rethinks partition option

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) officials have indicated to The CJN that the organization will likely endorse the controversial partitionist option.

The viability of the partition option has emerged in recent months, in the wake of the initiative by some Quebec municipalities that have expressed a determination to stay in Canada if Quebec separates.

Last summer, B'nai Brith in Quebec was among 18 organizations that formed the Coalition of Canadian Unity Groups.

Made up of a loose alliance of pro-federalist organizations – including Alliance Quebec, the Equality Party and the Quebec Committee for Canada – the coalition has been lobbying actively to have as many Quebec municipalities as possible pass "unity" resolutions.

While many if not most of such "unity" resolutions have been watered down from their original partitionist references, the Quebec media —anglophone and francophone alike —have uniformly portrayed their backers as being partitionist in their thinking.

According to Robert Libman, the former head of the Equality party and director for BBC in Quebec, there is a "very good chance" that its national body will officially back the "unity" initiative at its annual national convention this month in Ottawa.

Such a policy by BBC would contrast with that of the Jewish community's official representative body, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Although also actively pro-federalist, CJC has so far demurred from taking anything other than a "neutral" position on the partition issue, generally advocating a "Plan A" approach to Canadian unity before having to resort to "Plan B."

'Overwhelming consensus'

Libman noted that at an "interim" BBC assembly last February in Toronto, there was an "overwhelming" consensus that the national body should take an official stand on the right of federalist Quebecers to remain Canadian.

In Quebec, BBC did not formally adopt a pro-partitionist stance, but there "seems to be overwhelming support among most of our members for it [the pro-unity resolutions]," Libman said.

That level of support, Libman said, is what has prompted him, other BBC officials and lay members in Quebec to align themselves with the coalition.

Jack Jedwab, CJC-Quebec's executive director, said CJC-Q will continue in its efforts with the Italian and Greek communities to promote a "three-R" approach to national unity: "Reconciliation, Recognition and Renewal" that would include the adoption of some formula, "not necessarily 'distinct society,'" which recognizes "the vital role francophones have and continue to play in the identity and evolution of Canada," in the words of CJC's Political Action Guide.

But CJC has "no intention" of taking a stand on partition, Jedwab said, although he did not rule it out pending the result of a future planned referendum.

"The Jewish community is overwhelmingly federalist, but it is not monolithic [on the partition issue]," he said, while acknowledging that "many individuals in the Jewish community, as individuals, believe that if Canada is divisible, so is Quebec."

But as a position of "Jewish leadership," he said, there is no intention "for the time being" of budging from its neutral stance.

La Presse story 'pernicious'

"The coverage was pernicious, tendentious and insensitive."

Masson told the delegation that he would "analyse the dossier" and explain his newspaper's position more clearly in an Op-Ed piece. CJC-Q would also be given space inside La Presse to explain its opposition to the coverage.

Masson also told them that another article in his newspaper planned in the coming days would more clearly show the relevance of focusing in on Jewish identity.

But Sultan indicated that CJC would consider other options, such as filing a grievance with the Quebec Press Council, if Masson's article fell short of a retraction.

The CJC delegation did feel it strongly made its case to Masson that the articles were sensationalistic and that religious identity was completely irrelevant to the coverage of the story, which centred on the arrests by the RCMP of 31 individuals linked to an international hashish-smuggling operation.

A sidebar inside the same issue, about "15 Jewish Gangs Active in Quebec," traced the history of Jewish involvement in the underworld, with references to such notorious figures as Meyer Lansky and Benny (Bugsy) Siegel.

The same article attributed the prominent place of Jews in the underworld hierarchy to their "financial power and especially their invaluable contacts in almost every country in the world."

No other media referred at any time to the Jewish identity of seven of the 31 accused.

Neither did the RCMP, and the articles sparked accusations by Jewish, anti-racism groups and politicians – including B'nai Brith, the Communauté Sépharade du Québec (CSQ), and D'Arcy McGee Liberal MNA Lawrence Bergman – of pandering to ethnic and anti-Semitic stereotypes.

According to Sultan, Masson, while appearing to acknowledge that the inside sidebar may have "gone too far," saw Jewish involvement as relevant since the individuals who allegedly ran the money-laundering scheme are Jewish. He told them the reporter who wrote the story, André Cédilot, had been investigating Jewish links to organized crime for the last three years.

Masson also suggested that the his newspaper was referring to ethnic – not religious – identity in its coverage. He reiterated his view that a newspaper cannot exclude referring to ethnic identity out of a sense of "political correctness" if it perceives it to be relevant to the story.

For Sultan and other critics, however, Masson's position did not hold water. They said ethnic identity is irrelevant to criminal activity and simply reinforces stereotypes.

The Jewish delegation told Masson that La Presse's coverage was also inconsistent with a position it took in 1992, when the newspaper condemned in the strongest possible terms a report in a Quebec tabloid newspaper that linked the black community with criminal activity.

"We told him to be consistent," Sultan said, noting that La Presse fielded complaints about its "Jewish criminal" not only from the Jewish community but from the general public.

Still, despite being "wrong-headed, pernicious, and insensitive," Sultan did not believe there was any deliberate anti-Semitic intent in La Presse's coverage.

"We're not doing anyone a service by using the word 'anti-Semitic' when it is not there," he said. "You have to prove it. You just can't say it."

That position was at odds with that of CSQ spokesperson Elie Benchetrit, who was quoted as calling La Presse's coverage an "anti-Semitic attack."

"I am not happy with the CSQ's depiction of this," Sultan said.

The other members of the CJC-Q delegation meeting with Masson included regional chair Reisa Teitelbaum, executive director Jack Jedwab, former community relations chair Max Bernard and vice-chair Arielle Melloul.

Contradictory signals on el-Baz peace mission

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Egypt's effort to get the Israeli-Palestinian peace process back on track generated contradictory signals from the two sides last week.

A communique issued by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's bureau after his second round of talks with Egyptian envoy Osama el-Baz said "some progress was achieved."

But chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat said "the situation is very difficult" and that there still is "a wide gap" between the parties.

Erekat's evaluation was based on a briefing he received from Egypt's ambassador, Mohammed Bassiouny, who attended el-Baz's two-hour meeting with Netanyahu.

Netanyahu's spokesperson Shai Bazak described the session as "an attempt to define the problems dividing Israel and the Palestinian Authority (PA)."

He said el-Baz's contacts with the two sides "will continue," but noted that a date has not been set for another meeting between him and Netanyahu.

El-Baz returned to Cairo immediately after his talks here. He had been expected to confer with Erekat, but their meeting was cancelled and Bassiouny took his place.

"El-Baz had something urgent to do in the Egyptian capital," Erekat said, but said he did not know what that was.

The Netanyahu–el-Baz meeting was also attended by Foreign Minister David Levy, cabinet secretary Danny Naveh, policy adviser Uzi Arad and Levy aide Ya'acov Bardugo.

Erekat saw no chance of an early summit with the participation of Netanyahu, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

Erekat attributed the current impasse to Israel's ongoing settlement activity, contending that if it were frozen, "there would be no problem.

Among those he cited were failure to "dissolve" the civil administration in Judea and Samaria, refusal to "withdraw the military government" in these areas, and evasion of "further redeployment."

Among the other causes of friction were the non-implementation of safe passage between the West Bank and Gaza, and the "inability of Palestinians to drive their cars to Jordan and Egypt."

El-Baz's peace mission was seen by Foreign Ministry sources as a supplement, rather than a substitute, for the mediation undertaken by the United States.

U.S. envoy Dennis Ross is expected to return to the region once el-Baz nails down a basis for a running dialogue or further negotiations between Israel and the PA.

PA involved in murders: Israel

on intelligence information, police pursued the two cars. The chase lasted for 10 to 15 minutes before police stopped the cars, freed Rajibi, and arrested the six abducters.

Weapons were found in the possession of some of those arrested, he said, adding that two guns were thrown out of the cars during the chase.

At a news conference, Yitzhaki blamed the head of security in the PA for Rajibi's attempted abduction and the murder of Mahmoud Ali Jamhour, the third land dealer killed in recent weeks. Four of the six men involved in the abduction are Palestinian Preventive Security agents, he said.

"It appears the head of security in the PA is directly involved," Yitzhaki said, adding: The Jerusalem police are reported to have evidence linking Palestinian security in Ramallah to the killing of two of the murdered land dealers and to the attempted abduction of Rajibi.

Yitzhaki said police have proof that Jamhour and land dealer Farid Bashiti had been held in buildings known to belong to the PA before they were murdered. "This shows that it wasn't the initiative of one person," he said, adding that it appears that Bashiti and Jamhour were murdered in a building and their bodies dumped elsewhere.

Martin Indyk, U.S. ambassador to Israel, said that the United States condemns the killings "unreservedly."

"These killings must stop," he said. "Beyond the unacceptability of extra-judicial killings, they send a terrible message to Israelis and they're having a damaging impact on the PA's standing in Washington."

According to Ben-Ruby, police have a list of names of land dealers slated for murder, but he refused to divulge the number of dealers on the list. "We are taking measures to try to prevent further murders, but we can't physically protect or be responsible for every citizen," he said.

PA Justice Minister Freih Abu Medein said it is obvious that Israel is responsible for the murders. "I accuse the Israelis, those dealers, those traitors finished their job on the Israeli side. It's obvious Israel has a finger in it," he told reporters.

The accusation by Abu Medien was dismissed by David Bar-Illan, Netanyahu's media adviser, as "a ruse perpetrated by the PA.

"PA Chairman Yasser Arafat did not just turn on the green light for these murders to be committed, but actually sanctioned them," Bar-Illan said.

He said the notion that selling land to Jews is a crime "recalls the Nazis' Nuremberg laws."

Knesset law committee chair Shaul Yahalom (National Religious Party) called on the government to adopt a policy of land expropriation in response to the murders of Arab land dealers.

Response to terrorism discussed

EDGAR ASHER
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM — The collective worldwide responsibility to fight terror anywhere in the world was the subject of a seminar held recently in Jerusalem under the title, Terrorism: An Update Report. Among the contributors to the seminar was Canadian law professor Irwin Cotler from McGill University.

The seminar is part of a series of similar meetings being held in Israel over the next few weeks reviewing current trends and future threats of terrorism on global, regional and national levels.

Sponsored by the George Washington University Inter-University Centre for Terrorism Studies, the seminar reflected the ever increasing importance of academic input in the war against terror.

"I can report that there is some good news concerning the international fight against terrorism," said Prof. Yonah Alexander, the director of the centre. "Reported incidents of terror are the lowest in 25 years. There are many reasons for this, such as the end of the Cold War and the winds of democracy around the world. In fact today, 21 percent of nations are free communities and 40 percent enjoy a partial democracy.

"There is also, unfortunately, some bad news. Since the collapse of the Soviet Union there has been a proliferation of weapons available to terrorist groups. Also, individual acts of terror have involved greater brutalization than previously. Iran is still one of the worst purveyors of indirect terrorism. For example, Iran pours something like $70 to $150 million (U.S.) every year into terrorist groups in Lebanon, with of course, the acquiescence of Syria. If this funding was not available then Hezbollah would have dried out in three to four months. It is the stopping of financial backing to terrorist organizations that must be an international priority."

Alexander pointed out that Israel was well down on the international list of reported terrorist incidents. In fact Israel did not even appear on the list of the 20 top countries reporting such occurrences. In 1996, Asia reported most incidents followed by Latin America, Europe, the Middle East, Sub-Sahara and lastly North America.

Former director-general of the Israel Foreign Ministry, Ambassador Reuven Merhav, said that terrorism is a world problem and can only be dealt with by full international cooperation at every governmental level. "There is a precedent for cooperation to eliminate international terrorism," Merhav said. "About 150 years ago, piracy was almost the rule of law on the high seas. The leading nations at the time decided that enough was enough and it was determined to attack the pirates wherever they were — piracy was eliminated in a relatively short time."

It was pointed out that the nature of terrorism had changed dramatically in the past few years. The Internet is now a recruiting ground for terror organizations and many such organizations set up bogus umbrella groups to raise money, ostensibly for other causes. Last year for example, the Islamic Relief Committee in Nazareth, which was set up to raise money for orphans, was closed down when it was found that it was nothing less than a cover for raising money for Hamas. Biological terrorism is also a serious concern with all the participants agreeing that it was not a matter of "if" biological weapons would be used, but "when."

Cotler, who was recently appointed to Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy's Board of Directors of the International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development, told the seminar that Canada was a signatory to all 11 international treaties that exist to outlaw terrorism. "It is important how we look at terrorism today. Even though one person's terrorist is another's freedom fighter, terrorism must be seen internationally as a crime against human dignity and rights.

"We blur too often the moral crime of terror. It has to be reconceptualized. What is terror? All countries, like Canada, must legislate against terror and have a firm policy against it. We must take the war to the terrorist — it must be the first responsibility of states. Global phenomena need global solutions. The G-7 and the newly formed industrialized group of eight, which includes Russia, have the fight against terrorism high on their agenda."

Cotler commented on the recent extradition of Abu Mazook from the United States to Jordan after he had been found guilty in an American court of organizing international terror attacks. "What kind of message does this send when a convicted terrorist is seen to get away with his crime? Terrorists must be hunted down, tried by the due process of law and punished."

For Cotler his determined words and delivery had a special significance. On April 25 this year, during a Passover hike in Wadi Kelt just outside Jerusalem, two young women, Hagit Zavitsky and Liat Kastiel, who were both 23 years old, were brutally stabbed to death by terrorists and their bodies thrown down a hill into a pool of water. Hagit Zavitsky was Irwin Cotler's niece.

Six Day War recalled

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Thirty years ago on June 5, the Six Day War, one of the most momentous events in modern history broke out as waves of Israeli planes swooped into the Sinai Peninsula.

The climax of a three-week political crisis triggered by Syrian hostility, Soviet intrigue, Egyptian bluster, pan-Arab hysteria, United Nations incompetence and American indecisiveness, the war was the high-water mark of Israeli military dominance in the Middle East.

Israel's brilliant victory ushered in a costly two-front war of attrition, heightened the importance of the Palestinian national movement and sowed the seeds of the 1973 Yom Kippur War, which shattered illusions of Israeli invincibility and paved the way for an accommodation with Egypt.

The Six Day War was sparked by the rising crescendo of tension with Syria. A radical Baathist regime had seized power in Damascus and it encouraged the newly formed PLO to mount cross-border raids into Israel. The infiltrations exacerbated unresolved problems concerning demilitarized zones, fishing rights in the Sea of Galilee and access to the waters of the Jordan River.

On April 7, 1967, in an incident symptomatic of the border troubles, Syria shelled Israeli settlements near the Golan Heights. Israel hit back and in the ensuing battle six Syrian MIGs were downed by Israeli Mirages and Mysteres. In turn, Syria urged its ally, Egypt, to retaliate. Egypt, enmeshed in a civil war in Yemen, held back. But in the meantime, the Soviet Union – Syria's patron – circulated deliberately false rumors of a massive Israeli military buildup in the Galilee.

From this point onward, the crisis deepened. Gamal Abdul Nasser, the president of Egypt, demanded the removal from Israeli border areas of the United Nations peacekeeping force in the Sinai. Without consulting the major powers, the UN secretary-general, U Thant, complied.

The conflict escalated when Egypt dispatched 100,000 troops toward Israel and closed the Straits of Tiran – Israel's lifeline from Eilat – to Israeli shipping. Israel mobilized its reserves, but exercised restraint in the face of a U.S. promise to calm the situation by political means.

The Israeli government, led by then prime minister Levi Eshkol, sought to avoid war, fearing that casualties would run into the thousands. As chief of staff Yitzhak Rabin waited for a decision, Eshkol formed a national unity government and appointed Moshe Dayan as minister of defence.

In the Arab world, there were further ominous developments. Arab leaders aggressively rallied around Egypt, Nasser declared that his objective was Israel's destruction and Egypt signed a defence agreement with Jordan. Israel, besieged by a ring of Arab armies, went to war when it concluded that the United States would not or could not honor a 1957 commitment to maintain free movement in the Straits of Tiran.

Israel's triumph in the Six Day War was not only a function of preparedness, flexibility and courage but of Arab complacency. Nasser underestimated Israel's ability to knock out his air force in one fatal blow and failed to understand that once Israel gained air supremacy, his army would be exceedingly vulnerable. And the lack of coordination and trust between Egypt and its chief allies, Syria and Jordan (which was conned into the fighting by Egyptian misinformation), doomed the Arab war effort.

The war produced an ambivalent balance sheet. It gave Israel strategic depth but, with the proliferation of settlements and the onset of violence in the territories, polarized Israeli society. It embroiled Israel in mini wars along the Suez canal and in the Jordan Valley. It intensified the Arab-Israeli dispute (especially after the three noes of the Khartoum Conference), upgraded the role of the PLO and the Soviet Union, isolated Israel in Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe, and drew Israel and the United States into an informal alliance.

The community also demonstrates its love of the land of Israel, the rabbi said. "Our community is very Zionist. We have close ties with Israeli diplomatic leaders posted in Kinshasa. We meet on a regular basis."

Anti-Semitism, Rabbi Bentolila said, has never existed in Zaire. "The Zairians have always welcomed us with open arms... As far as I know, no member of our community has ever been a victim of a xenophobic act. No business or residence belonging to a Jew has ever been vandalized."

Strictly as a precaution, many of the Jewish women and children temporarily left the country when the conflict reached its height.

"The majority of the heads of the families stayed. They had professional obligations that they could not suddenly leave from one day to the next. But the situation here is certainly not as gloomy as the foreign media are depicting it daily. For months, when the conflict was at its worst, the authorities never imposed curfews in Kinshasa. We could go about freely at any hour of the night," Rabbi Bentolila recalled.

Asked if there is a future for the Jews in this country which is battered by serious inter-ethnic conflicts, the rabbi said, "I believe so. This country is endowed with incredible natural wealth and extraordinary human potential. Jews have always had a place in this welcoming and generous nation of some 45.3 million people. We see much hope for the future, with God's help.

TAU scientist's invention could cut nuclear terror

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The United States Patent Office has granted a patent to Tel Aviv University nuclear scientist prof. Alvin Radkowsky for an invention that, if adopted by governments, would significantly reduce the global threat of nuclear terrorism and the availability of nuclear weapons.

Radkowsky, who immigrated to Israel in 1972 after serving as chief scientist of the U.S. Naval Nuclear Propulsion Program for 24 years, invented a technology that uses thorium instead of uranium for much of the fuel in the core of nuclear reactors, and does not produce any by-products that could possibly be used for making weapons.

At present, all the approximately 400 commercial light-water reactors in the world discharge over 70 tons of plutonium annually. Only four kilos of plutonium are needed to make a nuclear bomb.

The invention is known as the non-proliferative light-water thorium reactor – or the Radkowsky Thorium Reactor (RTR). Thorium is much more plentiful and cheaper than uranium – it can even be mined in Israel – but until now, no practical method was found to exploit its potential in nuclear energy production.

Radkowsky noted last Sunday that another advantage of the RTR is a major reduction in nuclear waste, not only in quantity and toxicity, but also in radioactivity and heat emission. Nuclear-power countries are facing serious problems in storing nuclear waste, he said.

The RTR, he maintained, could reduce nuclear power costs by 20 percent to 30 percent, partly due to the savings in uranium. The RTR core is exactly the same size as existing standard uranium cores, so it can easily be substituted.

Radkowsky said he presented his ideas and design several years ago to then-energy minister prof. Yuval Ne'eman, who "didn't appreciate the significance of the discovery and didn't agree to allocate money for the project." Instead, he turned to the Raytheon Corporation in the United States, which was very interested. Now the patent has been granted to Radkowsky by the United States, and also approved by the Japanese and Russian governments.

Last month, Radkowsky presented information about the reactor to the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna, which is now considering it for approval. A cooperation agreement was recently signed with Nuclear Fuel Industries of Japan, and a full-scale prototype RTR is now being built at the Kurchatov Institute in Moscow with U.S. government funding. It should be ready by 1999.

Radkowsky said he believes Western governments should be pressured into selling only RTR-type nuclear reactors to countries such as Iran, Iraq, Libya and Syria. They would also be installed in developing countries that lack natural resources, without fear that unstable governments may divert the reactor fuel to make weapons.

"If we don't put a stop to conventional uranium cores now, nuclear terror will ensue, and the use of legitimate nuclear energy will be barred worldwide," he warned.

Radkowsky received a special award from the U.S. secretary of the navy for an invention that made it possible to lengthen the endurance of naval reactor cores from several weeks to many years. This invention has been declassified and is now used by nearly all commercial reactors.

To Your Health

In the first of regular monthly columns To Your Health, a partnership of Mount Sinai Hospital and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, will address a current issue which has received widespread media attention: hereditary breast cancer in the Ashkenazi Jewish population.

To Your Health asked Dr. Pamela Goodwin, head of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre of Mount Sinai Hospital and senior scientist at the Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute (SLRI), and Dr. Irene Andrulis, SLRI senior scientist and director of the Ontario Cancer Genetics Network, to update us on the risks and current research surrounding this issue.

Studies show that inherited predisposition to breast cancer may be more common in people of Ashkenazi (European) Jewish descent. It is estimated that two to three percent of Ashkenazi Jewish women carry a genetic trait that predisposes them to breast and ovarian cancer.

Men can inherit and pass on this trait, but are not at a significantly increased risk for cancer compared to women.

This trait is a gene alteration, called a mutation. Genes are our "blueprints" that determine our traits and characteristics. We know that genes for breast cancer exist, and that mutations in these genes predispose people to breast cancer. There are two known genes that are responsible for hereditary breast and ovarian cancer. The first gene for hereditary breast cancer, called BRCA-1, was identified in October 1994. The second breast cancer gene, BRCA-2, was found in December 1995.

At least four mutations in these two genes are responsible for hereditary breast and ovarian cancer in the Jewish population. Three of these mutations are found in BRCA-1 and one mutation is found in BRCA-2.

Women who inherit a BRCA-1 mutation are at a significantly increased risk for breast and ovarian cancer. Based on current research, the risk for breast cancer may be as high as 85 percent, and as high as 60 percent for ovarian cancer. Women may also have a slightly increased risk for colon cancer. The risk of cancer for men with a mutation has not been clearly established. They may have a slightly increased risk for prostate and colon cancer. People who carry a BRCA-1 or BRCA-2 mutation have a 50 percent chance of passing the mutation to a child.

Women who inherit a BRCA-2 mutation are also at an increased risk for breast and ovarian cancer, although their risk for breast cancer is possibly not as high as 85 percent, and their risk for ovarian cancer is probably only 10 to 20 percent. We estimate that men with a BRCA-2 mutation are at a risk of five to 10 percent for breast cancer.

In addition, in other work at Mount Sinai Hospital, Drs. Mark Redston, Hilmi Ozcelik and Steven Gallinger have recently found that Ashkenazi individuals with a BRCA-2 mutation have a very greatly elevated risk of pancreatic cancer.

The SLRI at Mount Sinai Hospital is involved in a multi-centred study looking at the prevalence of inherited breast cancer in Ashkenazi Jewish men and women. This study will help determine how common inherited breast cancer mutations are in this population.

Participants eligible for the study are people diagnosed with breast cancer who are of Ashkenazi Jewish ancestry.

Detailed family history, risk factor information and a blood sample will be required, and all participants will receive extensive genetic counselling.

When the genetic testing results show that a person has a "positive" result (of an inherited BRCA-1 or BRCA-2 mutation), genetic testing and counselling will be offered to family members to determine if they have the same mutation.

Information from this study will enable researchers to correlate the occurrence of breast cancer with genetic and environmental factors.

For more information about participation in this study, please call the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital 416-586-4738. Other participating centres include Toronto-Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre, Women's College Hospital and North York General Hospital.

Baycrest joins prestigious health care organization

TORONTO — The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has become the first member outside the United States of the National Chronic Care Consortium (NCCC), an alliance of leading non-profit health care systems.

To be considered for entry into the NCCC, member organizations must have a reputation for innovative leadership and must provide a full range of medical and other services to the individuals in their care.

"Baycrest was invited to apply for membership because the NCCC recognizes we represent a true system of care, providing a unique and comprehensive range of services," says Stephen Herbert, Baycrest's president and CEO.

The NCCC is committed to integrated care. Integrated health care systems are designed for the most effective use of resources while providing individuals with streamlined access to the care they need when they need it.

The NCCC has 30 members, including the Johns Hopkins Health System in Baltimore and Detroit's Henry Ford Health System.

Learning about each other

LIKE THE COLORS OF THE RAINBOW

Two young boys – one religious, one not – spend their break time together at the Keshet school in Jerusalem. Keshet is a new school with a special message. Founded in September 1995, Keshet teaches and encourages mutual respect and tolerance. The school attracts children from religious and non-religious homes with the hope that by the time they are adults they will have learned to live respectfully side by side, thus making their lives together as a community more beautiful than their lives apart as individuals, just like a rainbow. ONLY A CHILD

I am all alone, in a hiding place.
They took my mother, my father,
I am all alone in a hiding place.

Here in this ghetto,
I stand by the window,
hoping that one day I'll run free in a meadow
Here in this ghetto.

I hate this place!
Why did they do this to us?
Aren't we part of the human race?

I hate this place!

What did I ever do that was wrong?
Will I ever be free?
What is taking so long?
What did I ever do that was wrong?

I am only a child,
a child who has no one.
I have never smiled.
I am only a child.

Stranger in a strange land: new school, new classmates

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For many children, school can be a scary place. They worry about not being able to do all the work the teachers expect, about making friends and about being part of the crowd.

Imagine how much harder it is for immigrant children. For them, everything is new and different.

Eva Wiseman, who herself emigrated from Hungary as a child, has written a very moving book called A Place Not Home (Stoddart, 1996) about a 13-year-old girl who has to face all these problems.

Nelly lives with her parents and younger sister in Hungary. Although most of her family was lost in the Holocaust, and the country is under Communist rule, her life is happy.

She has a room that she loves, a circle of friends, and the same concerns as Canadian children her age — having to take music lessons, boring classes, and wondering if a boy that she likes, likes her back.

Then the 1956 Hungarian revolution begins, and at the same time as the Communists crack down on the revolutionaries, anti-Semitism begins to flourish.

Her parents and many of their friends decide to escape to the west, where they will be safer. Eventually, they make their way to Montreal.

The escape and their months in the refugee camps are very hard. For much of the time the family is hungry, short of clothes, frightened and unsure of what will happen to them.

Once they get to Canada, Nellie has to deal with unsympathetic and downright nasty kids in her school, until she learns to fit in.

Through the book, Nellie grows from a rather self-centred child, to a brave and understanding teenager.

It is interesting to see how her whole family learns to adjust to a new country, with a new language and different ways.

Wiseman says that one reason she wrote the book is so that children will learn to be sympathetic to those of other cultures. This book is sure to encourage this understanding.

Business Profile

The innovators behind Playdium

Entrepreneurs take playing games seriously

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Never has the playing of games been such serious business.

Time was, if you wanted to ride a go-cart, you'd go to a go-cart track; if you wanted to play miniature golf, you'd go to a mini-golf range; if you wanted to play video games, you'd go to an arcade; and if you wanted to go rock-climbing you'd head for Algonquin Park.

The facilities that served the game-playing public were usually mom and pop ventures that were pretty modest in scope or had unsavory reputations of attracting dissolute youth.

Not any more. Out in Mississauga, across from Square One and next to the recently completed multiplex theatre, is the Canadian mecca for afficionados of technological whiz-bangery.

Known alternatively as Playdium or Sega City, it's the brainchild of Jon Hussman and Steven Warsh, two young Toronto entrepreneurs with their fingers on the pulse of the games-playing public.

Occupying 12 acres of previously undeveloped real estate, Playdium is designed to be the leisure/entertainment concept for the millennium. Constructed at a cost of $18 million, the facility is largely debt free. Partnered with Sega Gameworks, which put up half the initial cost, Hussman and Warsh raised the rest of the sum themselves, bringing in "large Canadian investors."

Recently, two new investors signed on, Chinacem Group, which is owned by Nina Wang, a Hong Kong tycoon; and Chelsfield PLC, a British firm. Together they plan to pump $20 million into the venture.

Playdium combines an outdoor area full of summertime activities, like a go-cart track, mini-golf and rock climbing, with an indoor, neon-lit arcade featuring state of the art, participatory video games.

Unlike earlier generations of video games, these technological marvels allow consumers to become active participants through the creative use of computer-aided simulators.

As a result, you can sit on board a motorcycle and feel as if you're really in a race.

When you open your "bike's" throttle, you feel your speed increasing thanks to the changing image on a video screen in front of you and thanks to the motion of the bike beneath you. When you bank to the right, the bike and video make it feel that you are banking to the right. You actually feel like you're moving.

Similar setups are offered for grand prix road racing and water Ski-Doos. There's also a virtual reality hang-gliding game in which you lay prone on your stomach while maneuvering the glider through the Grand Canyon. The effect is so "real" you feel yourself soaring up or down, right or left.

Based on the tried and true premise of giving the people what they want, Playdium has registered remarkable success since it opened last August. From September to December, 250,000 people visited the entertainment complex, spending an average of $15 per person. Customers play with a Playdium debit card, similar to bank debit cards, after they've deposited a sum with the Playdium "bank." The electronic cards assist management in tracing the purchasing habits of customers.

The core of Playdium's clientele ranges in age from 12 to 25, though plenty of older folks enjoy the facility along with their kids and friends, said general manager Ian Moorhead.

Hussman and Warsh say they've tried to make the facility a clean, wholesome environment, where parents and kids can both come and have fun.

Playdium's image has clearly appealed to some prominent sponsors. The Toronto Blue Jays, eager to enhance their presence in Mississauga and other areas west of Metro, sponsor a large "clubhouse" complete with batting cages and club memorabilia, and also operate the Cito Gaston Baseball Academy, Moorhead said.

Famed race car driver Mario Andretti has lent his name to the mile-long go-cart track, which features cars that speed by at 25 miles per hour.

You can put a lot of games on 12 acres and there appears to be something for everyone, including computer golf and rock climbing. When they opened the doors last summer, Warsh and Hussman knew they had a tiger by the tail, but say that even they were surprised by Playdium's runaway success.

"We've been running over budget," Warsh, 41, said.

In the early '90s, long before the concept behind Playdium took root, the longtime friends and business partners were involved in real estate development. They began examining consumer patterns and "we noticed significant trends were taking place that would have significant impact on the out-of-home entertainment industry," Hussman, 37, said.

"We saw the migration of money to leisure...to double digit growth in out-of-home entertainment," said Warsh. At the same time, there was an industry-wide growth in computer-processing capacity and software — technology that would be the catalyst that changed the industry.

Marrying the new technology to the trend towards theme environments was like creating "an entertainment category-killer like Home Depot," Warsh said.

It's clearly caught on and Hussman believes it will become even more attractive to consumers as "more and more incredible games come onstream...at a cost where the customer gets great entertainment value."

Introducing new games to their clientele is a key part of the business and since September, there's been a 30 percent changeover in games, Warsh pointed out.

Warsh and Hussman believe there's plenty of room for three or four Playdiums in Toronto, with perhaps the next one opening by the summer or fall of 1998. In addition, the duo, who retain creative and strategic control of Playdium, say they are looking to expand to three sites in Vancouver and then to Hong Kong, London and Moscow.

Morris Winchevsky/ Camp Neivelt benefit

Artistic director lives for music

DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — The focal point of Brian Katz' life is music.

Guitarist, composer and teacher, Katz says that what drives him is "helping people to feel more musical."

On June 7, as artistic director of the benefit celebration for the Morris Winchevsky School and Camp Neivelt, Katz gathers the talents of leading performers, including Theresa Tova, Chutzpah, Michael Wex, Dave Wall, Rhea Tregebov and Sharon and Joe Hampson.

Brian Katz

On June 11, he performs with Hartzedike Lieder (comprised of Katz, Allan Merovitz and Martin van de Ven), a group that explores new directions in Yiddish music, at Mezzetta, on St. Clair Avenue West. On June 27 and 29, Katz teams up with New York guitarist Mordy Ferber for the Du Maurier Jazz Festival.

In addition to his live performances, Katz has made several recordings, most recently with singer Beth Anne Cole on the CD Song Under the Stair. He also conducts the Narayever Singers, teaches classical guitar at York University and is on the faculty at the University of Toronto Music Education Department.

Born in North York 41 years ago into a "music-friendly household," Katz says he realized very early the direction his life would take.

"My first big cathartic experience with music was hearing Louis Armstrong on the Ed Sullivan Show," he says. "I have a clear memory of breaking into tears when I heard him sing. He became my idol and I would imitate his gravelly style in performances for my family." In retrospect, Katz believes the combination of Armstrong's musicality and emotionalism is what moved him so deeply.

At the age of seven, Katz says, he wanted to be a Beatle after seeing the fab four on television. Shortly afterward, he began guitar lessons at a local conservatory and entered into a lifelong relationship with that instrument.

But it was in jazz flugelhornist/composer Fred Stone that Katz found the mentor who made the notion of being a professional musician compelling. Katz was 15 when he met Stone at a workshop. A classically trained, symphonic musician, who was a major exponent of "third stream music" (the blending of jazz and classical forms), Stone helped Katz strengthen his musicality and his sense of "being your own person in music".

Later, as a student at the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto and in the jazz programs at Humber College and York University, he continued to study with guitarists Eli Kassner, Ralph Towner and Norbert Kraft, South Indian drummer Trichy Sankaran, pianist Casey Sokol and composition teacher Sam Dolon.

Though the focus of Katz' work is the dynamics of improvisation, he believes that "art is something you work at." Music is not just for the chosen few, he says, but for anyone who wants to invest time in gaining a foundation of musical knowledge and is willing to expand his musical awareness.

According to Katz, many people close themselves to music because they have learned to believe they are not capable. This thinking is due to poor musical training and the popular belief that artistry is a commodity rather than a process.

Katz plans to give more concerts, which means playing abroad, since there are few venues for modern jazz in Canada. And as an educator, he wants to introduce better methods of connecting people to their musical potential. Mostly, though, Katz hopes to communicate the joy of making music.

The June 7 concert, which will also feature video clips from a conversation with Pete Seeger, starts at 7:30 p.m. at the Edward Johnson Building, University of Toronto, 80 Queen's Park Circle.

TOURISM BOOM REJUVENATES JORDAN

In Jordan, a country drawing increasing numbers of Jewish travellers since the 1995 peace treaty with Israel, government planners are keenly aware of the importance of tourism to the economy.

Last year the Hashemite Kingdom's gross national product (GNP) was about $7 billion, of which the tourism sector accounted for about $700 million or 10 percent. Currently experiencing a tourism boom, Jordan is building roads and hotels and laying out essential infrastructure elements as it prepares to welcome millions of Christian pilgrims in the year 2000.

"We feel that tourism can strengthen the peace process," he said. "That's why this ministry is always ahead of the other ministries in talking about peace."

However, tourism suffers in Jordan, as it does in Israel, each time a political development such as the Har Choma housing project threatens the fragile Israeli-Palestinian peace.

Delicate phase

"We need to have some sort of understanding between Palestinians and Israelis. This is essential for Jordan," he said. "Without this, we can't think that things can be normal in the region."

Jordan's minister of information, Dr. Marwan Muasher, noted that Jordan is in a delicate phase of growth as it tries to stand economically and politically on its own two feet. Throughout the 1980s, at least 20 percent of its GNP consisted in Arab aid, while remittances sent home by Jordanians working in oil-rich Gulf states made up another 20 percent. But Jordan's disastrous, self-protective alliance with Iraq in the Gulf War ultimately terminated these gifts.

"Now Jordan has to rely on its own resources in order to survive," Muasher said. "But since we have no noticeable natural resources, we must rely chiefly on tourism."

In a region where Islamic extremism and fundamentalism run strong, the Jordanians have recently introduced political reforms to bolster their parliamentary democracy, over which the king still seems to maintain the upper hand.

"There are no underground political parties in Jordan," Muasher said. "You cannot be a political party unless you accept the principle of pluralism and renounce violence as part of your constitution. You have to acknowledge the right of other parties to exist. It's a unique model that doesn't exist elsewhere in the Arab world."

Simultaneously the government has initiated a program of economic reform to make the economy more market-oriented and draw foreign investment. "Tourism is particularly attractive to investors," said Muasher. "Anything that is labor-intensive is near the top of the list, since labor is much cheaper here than in Israel."

Meanwhile, some Jordanians have already profited by utilizing Israel's international marketing contacts in exporting goods.

Jordan's peace, economic and political initiatives comprise a "three-pronged model" through which the government envisions the country's future — a vision to which it seems deeply committed. As for tourism, the Jordanians recognize they can't compete with Israel in places like Eilat.

Instead, the Jordanians intend to specialize in medical, health, archeological and religious tourism.

The two neighbors are jointly planning an international airport for the Aqaba-Eilat region. The facility would be in Jordan, with passenger exits in both countries. "It will be called the Peace Airport," Muasher said.

Jordanian and Israeli officials both acknowledge the road to peace is rocky but say the trip is irreversible. "There are obstacles but they can be overcome," said Omar Rifai, Jordan's ambassador in Tel Aviv.

"Meanwhile, we have a big interest in strengthening tourism. We believe that each person who comes to Israel and Jordan helps to stabilize the situation economically and thereby contributes to the peace process in his own small way."

JOLSON CRIES "MAMMY!" AT ROYAL ALEX

With his dynamic stage presence and powerful singing voice, Conley easily manages to rekindle Jolson's famous stage magic.

Writers Francis Essex and Rob Bettinson provide a sufficiently strong plot line upon which to peg the 32 musical numbers, which include such sentimental favorites as Rock-a-Bye Your Baby, Swanee, You Made Me Love You, April Showers and Sonny Boy.

At the show's close, I was among those who jumped to their feet in wholehearted applause.

Al Jolson

Incidentally, the real Jolson played the Royal Alex eight times between 1915 and 1941. After the last performance, Saturday Night reviewer Robertson Davies wrote:

"Al Jolson has a winning way and a surety of touch, a rapport with his audience which would spread like a guffaw through the pews of a tabernacle. Such ability commands respect, and there is no doubt that, within the limits of his personality and his material, he is an artist of the highest order, one whom no student of the theatre should neglect to see and study. Go see Mr. Jolson; he is worth it!"

This production is not to be missed if you are a Jolson fan. For tickets ($25 to $89) call TicketKing at 416-872-1212 or 800-461-3333. Until Sept. 6.

Ashkenaz '97 Releases Line-up

Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture unfolds at Harbourfront Centre Aug. 25 to Sept. 1. According to festival director David Buchbinder, "This festival is going to jump up, grab you by the hand and take you on a ride you won't soon forget."

Theresa Tova

Musical talent includes the Ashkenaz orchestra Project (a "new Yiddish supergroup"), Andy Statman Quartet, John Zorn's Bar Kochba, Kapelye, the Klezmatics, the famed Epstein Brothers (from the film A Tickle In The Heart), the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, Esta from Israel, Davka, Naftule's Dream, Salomon Klezmorim and local diva extraordinaire Theresa Tova.

Theatre endeavors include a gripping new adaptation from Poland of S. Ansky's masterpiece The Dybbuk, the world premiere of The Memoirs of Gluckel of Hameln, a production of The Last Yiddish Poet imported from San Francisco, and Toronto-based Theatre Asylum's recent hit My Mother's Courage.

Ashkenaz also features numerous dance, film and visual arts events, as well as a parade, late night cabaret, children's events, marketplace, workshops and more. Call 416-973-3000 or 416-973-4000 for details.

Film Notes

• The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents The Dybbuk, the 1937 Yiddish film classic from Poland (with English subtitles). Fully restored. The celebrated play by S. Ansky, involving promises made for unborn children and a bride possessed by a dybbuk, has been described as a "rich ethnographic tapestry of Jewish lore and legend." June 8, Art Gallery of Ontario, Jackman Hall. Members should arrive by 7 p.m. for 7:30 screening; single ticket sales start at 7:15 p.m. Bill Emery, 924-6211.

Theatre

• The Yorkminstrels Show Choir presents Music, Music, Music! (Or What Would We Do Without It?), Leah Posluns Theatre, Thurs. June 26, 8 p.m. Songs include medleys from Crazy For You, Fiddler On The Roof and Showboat and other favorites from the 1920s to today. Tickets ($15), 416-214-6162.

Women's hoops team gears up for Maccabiah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although they'll never be mistaken for chalutzim, the early Zionist settlers of Israel, Maccabi Canada's woman's basketball team consider themselves as something like pioneers as they prepare to blaze a trail in the uncharted area of Maccabiah sports competition.

Ten Canadian women, two coaches and four alternates (funding permitting) are slated to represent the Great White North at the summertime games, which begin in July. Their participation will mark the first time Canada has ever sent a woman's team to the games.

With only two other countries participating, Israel and Hungary, Canada will play each twice and, hopefully, advance to the one-game, gold medal matchup.

For coach Sy Herling, the games promise to be "a learning experience. I think we'll be as prepared as we can be given the situation," he said.

Herling was referring to the unusual chain of events that led to the rather unexpected inclusion of women's basketball in the games. The decision to include women's hoops was so unforeseen that the United States, normally a sure bet for the medal round, will not even participate in the competition. Neither will Australia, which boasts a number of top female stars.

Maccabi Canada has been pushing for the inclusion of women's hoops for some time. There's plenty of talent in Canada and fielding a women's team would help to correct the tilt on the Canadian team that is already heavily weighted in favor of men's sports, Herling said. Women make up only about 20 percent of the Canadian Maccabi team, he added.

They were pared down to the current roster that includes 10 regulars and four alternates. Of the seven team members from Toronto, five are alumni of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) Blue Demons. Several were on the team that captured the gold medal at the 1993 JCC/Maccabi Youth Games.

Overall, Herling and his assistant, Neil Rothenberg, expect to field a very young team. What they lack in experience, they appear to make up for in enthusiasm.

The prospect of playing Maccabiah basketball is really exciting, said 20-year-old Dena Weinroth, a member of the York Yeowomen varsity team. "I've never been to Israel. It was one of my basketball goals, to make the team."

Weinroth, a guard, hopes to duplicate the excitement she felt as part of the Yeowomen team that got the the CIAU national finals, upsetting the favored University of Toronto Blues on the way. She already has a gold medal as a member of the women's team that won in Pittsburgh as well as a silver from the '91 competition in New Jersey.

At 27, Robyn Lerer is the veteran of the team. Lerer played four years of college ball at McMaster before graduating in 1992. She currently plays recreational basketball for York Raiders.

At 5 foot 10 inches, Lerer is the team's post player (centre). She's pumped about the opportunity of playing in Israel.

"I've always been involved in trying to get a women's team," she said. "It's a major high. It's huge ...You think of the Maccabiah Games as the Olympics for Jewish athletes. Just being part of the Maccabiah Games is exciting.

"I've always wanted to go to the real Maccabiah since I was young, said Eva Ain, 19. A member of Toronto JCC Youth Games teams, Ain expects to play for Ryerson Rams next fall. The 5-foot-9 guard says, "This is the most exciting thing in my life. The opportunity to go to Israel and represent Canada, it's an incredible feeling.

In addition to their workouts, the team will travel to Montreal June 21 and 22 to play a benefit game versus McGill's summer league team. They'll follow that up with two benefit games in Toronto, on July 3 at the Bloor JCC and on July 7 at the BJC.

Funds from the games will go towards costs of sending the team to Israel.

In addition to Weinroth, Lerer and Ain, other Toronto members of the team include Stephanie Splitter, a member of the 1996-97 U of T Blues; Kim Model, MVP of the King City girls high school team; Karen Shaw, a member of the 1996-97 McGill Martlets; and Danielle Goldfarb, a member of the Martlets from 1993-95.

The Inside Back

Children truly are a mixed blessing at repair time

By JORDAN MAX

I suppose it might be possible after Pesach has finished and everything has been packed away for another year, to actually sit back, exhausted but content. It might even be possible to become somewhat depressed at the sudden lack of purposeful activity. However, around our house, pre-Pesach cleaning is just a warmup for yours truly's Great Annual Home Repair Extravaganza. The only downside of spending so much time at home during yom tov is that you start noticing all the damage caused to the house — the exterior by the winter and the interior by the kids. I add to that list by looking at last spring/summer/fall's list of incomplete projects and urgent repairs before even contemplating anything new.

Now, for a member of the People of the Book, I'm actually relatively handy with repairs, provided I have the right tools and, here's the clincher, unobstructed time. But with three active children, free Sunday daylight hours are neither readily available nor taken for granted. The alternative is to enlist the help of my children (at least the two older boys, the baby can't swing a hammer — yet).

The words "I want to help!" uttered enthusiastically by small children are simultaneously the most beautiful and yet most feared words a parent can hear. The speed with which they get on their jackets and gather their tools is truly awesome (why not when getting ready for school or bedtime?) Before I can say "um, well...," out come the play tools, the advice, the endless questions, punctuated by requests for shoelace tying, snacks and bathroom breaks, fights over the tools, etc., which turn even the simplest repair into a full afternoon's work. In some instances, as my bemused neighbors can verify, I have actually been known to do outside house repairs by moonlight as the only alternative.

For example, last year, I began the backbreaking task of moving and leveling buckled patio stones. No sooner had I managed to lay down a smooth, level layer of limestone than I was joined by my "helpers" and their snow shovels, (I knew I should have put those away!) who instead saw an archeological excavation site harboring dinosaur bones. To make a long story short, the job was only completed after the boys had gone to sleep that night.

The top item on this year's list is cleaning the paint from the bricks and driveway that was intended for the garage door last year, thanks to an exuberant "painter" mistakenly left unsupervised for 30 seconds. Once I finish that, "their" vegetable garden still awaits my digging and preparation. Get the idea?

While I realize that these experiences also apply to other household chores, I'm still left in a pedagogical quandary. On the one hand, I need to get the work done before the house falls apart and/or the snow flies. On the other hand, I want my children to grow up actually seeing, if not experiencing real hands-on labor for their own education. Sure, it's great to have an accountant, doctor, dentist, or stockbroker in the family — it just won't help a bit when the pipes burst, the fuses blow or the kitchen garburator gets plugged with matzah (again).

So a little do-it-yourself wouldn't hurt. Maybe the kids will even be less likely to damage drywall if they know how much time (that's non-television time) it takes to fix it. Otherwise, I fear they'll grow up thinking that all repairs just magically get done by a Repair Fairy who does his/her magic only at night (just like the Pesach fairy who magically transforms the kitchen at night both before and after Pesach), or that the only way to solve our problems is to call in the expert. So I guess I've just answered my own question. Hey kids, who wants to help me caulk the windows?

A DIFFERENT LEEK SOUP
WE SELL KitchenAid FOR LESS

1 bunch leeks
2 tblsp margarine
5 potatoes, cubed
2 large carrots, diced or shredded
2 1/2 cups water
2 tsp chicken soup powder (pareve)
salt, pepper, basil, rosemary, to taste
1 cup tomato juice

In a Dutch oven, sauté leeks lightly in the margarine. Add potatoes and carrots. Add water, chicken powder, and spices. Cook very slowly for 45 minutes. Add tomato juice and adjust seasonings, if necessary. Yield: 4-6 servings

Note: This recipe freezes well. But if it is too thick upon defrosting, add more tomato juice or chicken broth.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I work for a medium-size company. Last year, when we needed to hire a few new people, we put an ad in the paper and got over a thousand responses! We hired two new people but they didn't work out. Now we need to replace them and maybe hire a few more people. Is there a better way?

Dear Reader,

Wow! It's great to hear your company is hiring again, but it's too bad that the people you hired last year didn't work out. I'd like to suggest a new approach. Unfortunately, unemployment is high and when you place an ad in the paper, anyone who thinks they may be able to handle even part of the skills your advertisement lists, will apply for this position. Furthermore, since many of these people are desperate for work, you may hire someone who either has misled you about his experience or whose working skills are poor.

The Career Foundation aims to help employers and the unemployed deal with this situation. They use a methodology that almost guarantees a great match.

First, they visit an employer and help them decide what types of skills and personality describe the person who would fit best into the new position. Then the Career Foundation actually looks for people who match that description. Those people who meet the company's standards, are invited to a two-week training program prior to reporting for work. During the training they review communication skills, conflict management, problem solving and a variety of other topics that will help those people be better workers. This is a vital step considering many people have been out of work for a long time and may have forgotten these important skills.

Following the training period, the candidates report for work, where any on the job training is the employer's responsibility.

The program continues to be extremely successful in York Region. For more information contact the Career Foundation at 905-660-1076.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

Arafat backs down

PA leader 'blinked' to get Cairo talks started

By MARK A. HELLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

For three months, since ground was broken for the Har Choma project, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu have been playing a game of chicken. Each was betting that the dangers of a frozen peace process would force the other to give way.

Commentary

Last week, Arafat blinked. His decision to send his representatives to Cairo cannot have been easy. It reverses the basic Palestinian policy of postponing serious engagement in the hope that regional and international pressure would force Israel to comply with the Palestinian interpretation of Israel's obligations under the Interim Agreement.

If this happened, Israel would have to give up territorial assets and concede a more favorable opening position for the Palestinian side when talks eventually did begin. If not, Israel would lose further political/diplomatic assets, even as the PA continued to entrench itself in east Jerusalem and before any new Palestinian undertakings were required in permanent status negotiations.

But the strategy of stalling was not without its risks. Some Palestinians argued that it played right into Netanyahu's hands, since there seemed no prospect of serious pressure, especially from the United States, and any outbreak of violence might backfire.

Arafat's inability to deliver anything on the peace process front also attracted greater domestic attention to other reasons for public disenchantment — waste, arbitrary exercise of power and corruption.

And the combination of stalemate and shortcomings in Palestinian governance jeopardized international assistance to the PA, from the donor countries in general, and from the United States in particular. The Middle East Peace Facilitation Act comes up in the United States for renewal this summer in the face of growing congressional indifference or outright hostility.

As a result, Arafat was forced to drop his requirement that Israel suspend settlement construction before contacts could be renewed.

Indeed, so great was the need to move things off dead centre that Palestinian officials were even

Second Swiss report on banks expected soon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

ZURICH — Hanspeter Hani, the reticent ombudsman of the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA), will be in the thick of the news once again later this month or early next month when he delivers his second report on dormant accounts in Swiss banks.

When he submitted the first installment last November, the response from Jewish organizations in Switzerland and abroad was one of surprise and skepticism.

Hani, a 46-year-old official who was appointed to his position eight months ago, claimed that dormant accounts Swiss banks had dredged up were worth no more than about $1.6 million. (This was in addition to the $40 million already turned up by the SBA in the past year.)

Of this sum, he announced, approximately $11,000 could be traced to five Jewish deposit holders, three of whom had been murdered during the Holocaust and two of whom had died in Romania in 1963 and 1974, respectively.

The World Jewish Congress, which has been in the forefront of a concerted worldwide campaign to induce Swiss banks to settle the claims of pre-World War II Jewish clients, was flabbergasted, calling it a "pathetic amount."

WORLD LEADERS EXPRESS SHOCK AT MASSACRE

Jewish and non-Jewish leaders around the world have expressed shock, regret and condemnation of the Lydda Airport massacre of 25 persons last week.

Premier Golda Meir promised Israel would find a way to foil the new Arab terror. Foreign Minister Abba Eban called for an international airline boycott of Beirut to force the Lebanese government to expel terrorist organizations that plan attacks such as the May 31 one carried out by three Japanese gunmen.

A spokesman for the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine declared that "our purpose was to kill as many people as possible at the airport — Israelis of course, but any one else who was there."

SEPARATISTS ARE NOT ANTI-SEMITES

Should Quebec ever separate from Canada, Jews would likely remain in the province, if the ruling party allowed them to be a part of the middle class, says Saul Hayes, executive vice-president of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Jews would leave, he added, if the middle class were no longer able to function in the new economic order. "There has not been the slightest tinge of anti-Semitism" in labor or nationalist movements he said.

Responsibility.

Challenges facing world Jewry explored

'[We need] less meetings, more babies'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Calls for Jewish unity, strengthened Jewish identity, willingness to take an active role and better communication between Israelis and Diaspora Jews were among the prescriptions offered to the Jewish community at a recent panel discussion on the State of World Jewry.

Fielding questions from CTV news anchor Sandie Rinaldo, who served as moderator for the Aish HaTorah event held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, were panelists Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chair, Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations; Douglas Bloomfield, the Washington coordinator for World Jewish Congress investigations into Swiss banks and Nazi gold; and Yoram Ettinger, diplomat and former director of the Israeli government press office.

Preceding the panel were remarks by Harold Nashman, chair of the international outreach organization's Toronto board; Aish alumna Lisa Berger and (on video) Ehud Olmert, mayor of Jerusalem.

Among the challenges facing world Jewry are dangerous trends such as the rise of anti-Semitism in Russia, the threat of Islamic fundamentalism and the American "Mega" scandal regarding allegations of Israeli spying, said Hoenlein.

Such tendencies "affect the perception of things we value," warned Hoenlein. "Verbal violence has always been followed by physical violence. Don't dismiss it."

The question of assimilation, a major concern among North Americans over the last few years, was addressed strongly but almost peripherally, after a question was posed late in the program.

"[We need] less meetings, more babies. Make sure young people marry Jewish. Go to the campuses. Whatever will bring them back, but give them the real thing, real Jewish experiences, spirituality, not more fancy buildings. No more edifice complex," said Hoenlein. "We have to offer it to them."

On several occasions Bloomfield advised "using the political system of the countries we live in" to help Israel and withstand threats to world Jewry. "Only by being involved can we really defend ourselves."

The ongoing Swiss bank investigation also involves investigations regarding 10 other countries, said Bloomfield.

"This is not a matter of finances or vengeance," stressed Hoenlein. "It's a matter of justice, an attempt to restore a measure of dignity to those who died in the Shoah."

The speakers attempted to amend a number of perceptions over the course of the evening.

Hoenlein challenged Rinaldo's description of newly elected Israeli Labor party leader Ehud Barak, stating that belief in Israel's security "doesn't make someone a hawk."

Sidestepping her question about whether Barak is the right leader for the party now, Hoenlein emphasized the answer – as for other important issues – is up to Israelis only.

The significance of the Knesset bill regarding non-Orthodox conversions, which have long been banned in Israel, is among the perceptions about Israel which have become "exaggerated," according to Ettinger.

He claimed few Israelis, aside from politicians and the media, are "preoccupied" with the issue of who is a Jew.

While the vast majority of North American Jews are Conservative or Reform, the reverse is true in Israel, noted Bloomfield. "Many Jews in North America feel they're in danger of being disenfranchised. There has to be better communication between the two communities to understand what is happening. It is just beginning."

The issue of Jerusalem has been part of the religious-secular "battlefield," said Ettinger, adding that the city has become "much more secular" over the past decade, with pubs and movie theatres open on Shabbat.

He emphasized that Jerusalem is non-negotiable, but admitted that for Israel to adhere to that position would be "the real test" of Israel's hitherto friendly relationship with the United States.

Calls for Jewish cohesiveness by the speakers were received with applause from the 1,200-person audience. "When we are divided against each other, every challenge is too great," Hoenlein said.

From the editor's desk

In this column, I want to bring to the readers' attention recent findings about the international image portrayed not by Israel, but by Canada.

Across my desk, I recently received a copy of the highlights of the results of a survey conducted by the Angus Reid Group entitled Canada and the World: An International Perspective on Canada and Canadians.

The material contains no explanation of methodology, no analysis nor any commentary. It was a bare recitation of the responses to a series of questions on topics related to aspects of life in Canada posed to 5,701 adults in 20 countries.

The 20 countries were from five different regions around the globe: North America, South America, Europe, Mid-East/Africa and Asia/-Australia.

I do not know how the adults were selected to take part in the survey; in what manner the survey was conducted; over how long a period of time it was conducted; or how statistically significant the findings are. But they are interesting.

Especially interesting for me were the opinions about Canada held by the 202 survey participants from Israel.

Responses were sought in some two dozen different categories of tions. I cannot, therefore, reproduce all of the results to all of the questions. But I will reproduce a sampling.

To the question: Where does Canada rank as a desirable place to live?, 72 Israelis placed Canada among the top 10 countries. Of these 72, 11 considered Canada to be in the top two desirable countries; 24 ranked Canada in the top three countries; 37 considered Canada to be "only" in the top 10.

Of the 20 countries polled, the total figure for the "Israel" response was second lowest. Only adults from Russia, in fewer numbers, considered Canada to be a desirable place to live. Sixty-two Russians placed Canada among the top 10 countries overall.

To the question: Where else would people want to live: "top-of-mind" top choices, 11 percent of Israelis surveyed selected Canada. The six top Israeli choices, in order, were: United States: 35 percent; U.K.: 13 percent; Canada: 11 percent; France: 10 percent; Australia: nine percent and Switzerland: eight percent.

To the question: Where does Canada rank for a positive role in world affairs?, Israelis were at the very bottom of the 20 country pile. In total, 49 Israelis placed Canada in the top 10 countries overall. Of these 49, 10 placed Canada in the top three; none considered Canada to be among the top two.

To the question: Where does Canada rank among countries you admire most?, Israelis named Canada among the top 10, the second fewest number of times, 73, surpassed, again, only by Russia with 64.

Ever since the activist polices of Lester Pearson, Canadians have taken considerable pride in Canada's international peacekeeping record. Apparently, Israelis are not aware of this aspect of Canada's foreign or military policies.

Forty-seven respondents from Israel, the fifth lowest number, strongly or moderately agreed with the proposition that Canada is a world leader working for peace. Only 30 respondents in Israel considered Canada's role in world peacekeeping as somewhat or very substantial. This was the lowest figure among all the countries surveyed. Conversely, 52 Israeli respondents viewed Canada's peacekeeping role as being very minor or minor. This was the largest such finding among the countries polled.

Where Israeli awareness of the various aspects of Canadian life did manifest in relatively high numbers was in their familiarity with national unity issues.

Sixty-seven respondents either strongly or moderately agreed that "French-speaking culture is a distinct society in North America." The highest score on this question was registered by 89 of the American respondents.

Fifty-three out of 97 Israelis were aware "of the possibility of Quebec leaving Canada to become an independent country." Among these 53, there was a wide range of opinion expressed as to the likelihood of Quebec separation.

Only seven of the 19 other countries evidenced more people who were aware of the national unity situation in Canada.

The information contained in the survey is fascinating. It is a mirror held up in front of us showing us to what extent the rest of the world regards us in the way that we regard ourselves.

In our May 29 story, "Anger, outrage mark anti-Nazi rally," we incorrectly reported that Antanas Kenstavicius served with the 12th Lithuanian Police Battalion. In fact, keynote speaker Efraim Zuroff said Kenstavicius commanded the Lithuanian police in the Svencionys district of Lithuania and was involved in the murder of Jews in that area.

CJC task force to focus on conversion issue

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A unity task force to defuse the crisis over the conversion issue in Israel, and hopefully, to be a model for solving it in the United States as well, was set up June 1 by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Since time is of the essence, the task force, headed by Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa, was given orders to move quickly by delegates to the CJC's national executive meeting in Toronto.

Rabbi Bulka said he hopes that Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple representing Reform, and Rabbi Philip Scheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Congregation representing Conservative, both of Toronto, will join him on the task force.

"The Israeli government has been given an extension by the courts until mid-June to decide what to do with this bill, so we must act quickly," Rabbi Bulka said.

He was referring to a bill introduced in the Knesset, which would legalize only Orthodox conversions in Israel, and which has angered many Conservative and Reform adherents.

The CJC resolution approved unanimously calls upon the Israeli government to make every effort possible to come to an accommodation between the parties and avoid a second and third reading of the conversion bill.

Rabbi Bulka said the aim of the new task force is to join those in Israel who are trying to solve the problem by having those who applied to the courts on this issue withdraw, so that the government "can take the bill off the books."

The motion to set up the task force reflected the urgency with which the delegates from all parts of Canada viewed the issue. They overcame procedural roadblocks resulting from the tabling of a motion at its last executive meeting.

It was only when Rabbi Bulka assured the delegates that the motion to ask the government to avoid second and third reading would be as effective as asking it to withdraw the bill that the last amendment was withdrawn.

The conversion issue has stirred such deep reaction, Rabbi Bulka said, that for the first time in Canada some congregations are proposing that Israel Bonds not be sold on Yom Kippur.

"This situation is very explosive in the United States and we should intervene in Canada before it erupts there," said CJC president Goldie Hershon.

Even if the current bill is withdrawn, Rabbi Bulka said, there should be no illusion that the problem splitting the Diaspora is solved.

The "irresponsible resolution" by the Council of Orthodox Rabbis in the United States brought into the open "the malaise in our community," he said. However, he noted, there is a positive side, because for the first time, the main Orthodox organizations rejected a statement from the Council.

"This [the conversion issue] is a good issue for unity in the community," said Keith Landy of Toronto, CJC's honorary national legal counsel.

"I'm not sure we can do anything. I don't want to set up unrealistic expectations," said Rabbi Bulka. "We may be able to get a consensus on this legislation, but it's a pipe dream that we'll ever get a common policy on conversions and divorces."

"Canadian Jewry needs to send a strong message," said Simon Rosenblum, co-chair of Canadian Friends of Peace Now. "This is the tip of the iceberg. The whole issue of religious pluralism is in dire jeopardy. There is a move to keep Conservative and Reform rabbis off religious councils in Israel. All this is going to wreak havoc with the Zionist movement."

On another matter, in the case of Delwin Vriend, a former employee of a Christian College (King's College, Edmonton), who believes he was fired because he is gay, the CJC is intervening only in support of his right to appeal on the issue of sexual orientation, not on whether his job should be terminated.

"A number of people in eastern Canada have expressed concern," said community relations chair Hal Joffe of Calgary. "We know there is no general consensus on this."

The future of the CJC as outlined in a draft report triggered a far-reaching debate. "We know that many of you want things to change and we are listening," said Renee Switzer of Vancouver, national CJC chair.

No changes will be made before being approved by the 1998 plenary, she said, but in the meantime the CJC must submit a report to a meeting next week of the Council of Jewish Federations of which CJC is a member. The council is setting its budget at that time, she said.

"We are finally meeting with some success," said Bernie Farber, CJC's community relations director, reporting that "dozens" more deportation orders against alleged war criminals in Canada are being processed by the federal justice department.

One involves a member of the 12th Battalion of the Lithuanian Guard who lives in Montreal, and another a man who lives in St. Catharines.

Noting that only 20 candidates out of 1,200 running in the federal election were Jewish, Robbie Diamond asked that political internships for Jewish youth be established. "If it isn't done by September, it will go into oblivion," he said.

Hershon welcomed a suggestion by Farber that CJC's next federal election guide weigh what the position of the various parties is on Jewish issues.

The delegates adopted a motion by Nathan Leipciger that the CJC quickly provide information to survivors about how they can file claims for assets in Switzerland. Hershon said she is meeting shortly with Daniel Dayer, Switzerland's ambassador to Canada.

Allegations put Podins in camp

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Alleged Nazi war criminal Eduards Podins worked as a policeman in the Valmiera replacement camp from November 1941 until at least September 1943, during which time "political prisoners were persecuted through confinement, torture and execution," states a government document filed in Federal Court last week.

As a member of the Latvian auxiliary police, Podins served in the concentration camp principally "in management matters. Being in charge of the concentration camp supplies stores, his duties included the guarding of prisoners," the Crown's summary of facts and evidence states.

The document was filed as part of the government's attempt to strip Podins of his citizenship and deport him. The Justice Department alleges that Podins withheld key information about his wartime service in the Valmiera concentration camp, entered Canada and obtained citizenship by fraudulent means.

Podins is the 11th of 12 alleged Nazi war criminals to face deportation for lying about their wartime activities. While Podins is alleged to have failed to divulge information about his service at Valmiera, the documents also contend that "on or about Sept. 3, 1990, [Podins] admitted to the United States Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) that he had worked in a concentration camp during World War II."

Two INS officer and 16 Latvian witnesses are among the witnesses the Crown states it plans to call. The government also plans to enter dozens of routine wartime documents, including a list of the concentration camp employees, a letter listing Valmiera personnel entitled to a monthly alcohol ration, as well as a certificate issued by the head of the concentration camp, "mentioning Podins' service as an Auxiliary Policeman from Nov. 17, 1941 to April 1, 1943."

Meanwhile, a published report from Selidovo, Ukraine, suggests the daughter and granddaughter of alleged war criminal Wasily Bogutin may have intimidated potential witnesses in his denaturalization case. Bogutin, 88, is alleged to have participated in the massacre of civilians in Nazi-occupied Ukraine and for the past two weeks, the court has heard evidence in Ukraine.

A story in the Globe and Mail suggests Bogutin's daughter and granddaughter met with elderly witnesses on the weekend before they gave evidence, and asked why they were saying negative things about Bogutin. One witness subsequently declined to testify, the newspaper reported.

In Canada, the Supreme Court has granted Canadian Jewish Congress intervener status in the case involving Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobiass. No other Jewish group received intervener status.

Lawyers for the three men argue the cases should be stayed because discussions between a senior government official and the Chief Justice of the Federal Court mounted to judicial interference.

And 60 Minutes is planning to rebroadcast Canada's Dark Secret, its investigation into Canada's poor record in dealing with Nazi war criminals. The program will air on July 20.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish officials have expressed satisfaction with the results of last week's national election that saw a slight weakening of the separatist party in Quebec.

Any perceived weakening of the separatists will serve to bolster the spirits of Montreal's 101,000-strong Jewish community.

However, the Reform party's new status as official Opposition may hinder national unity, some observers say, because its "tough-love" attitude toward Quebec probably pushed many of that province's voters into the separatist fold.

"The Reform party will be a millstone around the federalists' neck for the next few years because they will issue statements that will be seen as anti-Quebec, and those statements will be used to drag down the federalist side," said

Abella characterized the new Parliament as a "multi-party quilt," with each of the five parties – the New Democratic Party and the Progressive Conservatives are the other two – representing different points of view and visions.

Frank Dimant, executive director of B'nai Brith Canada, sees similarities between the composition of Canada's new Parliament and the Knesset.

"It will mean that we'll have to do a lot more work and a lot more lobbying to make sure that each of the five parties is aware of the issues on the Jewish agenda."

During the campaign, CJC raised a variety of domestic and international issues with the candidates, including the presence of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada, national unity, the fight against racism, and refugee and immigration policies.

The Liberal party lost seats in the 301-seat Parliament but still managed to maintain a majority of 155 seats, two-thirds of which came from Ontario.

Meanwhile the Reform party failed to win a single riding east of Manitoba, while the Bloc Québécois, by self-definition, only won seats within Quebec.

Thanks largely to the personal charisma of leader Jean Charest, the Progressive Conservatives made a dramatic comeback from two to 21 seats, almost all in Quebec and Atlantic Canada.

The New Democratic Party also made gains at the Liberals' expense in the eastern provinces, increasing from nine to 20 seats.

"I think it's disturbing that the country is so fragmented and that there's only one party that can make a reasonable claim to being a national party," said Harold Waller, a professor of political science at McGill University in Montreal.

Canada's next Parliament will see five Jewish members, all on the government side of the House: veteran MPs Sheila Finestone and Herb Gray; Elinor Caplan, representing Thornhill; and two newcomers from Quebec: Raymonde Folco, who was elected in Laval West; and Jacques Saada, who won in Brossard-La Prairie.

Humber joins fight to save Branson

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Another hospital has joined the fight to keep Branson hospital and all its clinics open as an ambulatory care centre.

The Humber River Regional Hospital, formerly York-Finch, at Jane and 401, is negotiating for this, said Brian Fenton, Branson senior vice-president.

This might also help solve the problem of where 100 medical specialists at Branson will be able to admit their patients when the acute beds at Branson are closed as scheduled in two years, Fenton said.

"We're hoping to come up with the answer that the commission wants to keep Branson open," he said. (The Hospital Services Restructuring Commission has set no date for a final decision on the matter.)

Fenton said the commission has already agreed to a plan in Sudbury similar to the one proposed for Branson.

A group of staff members at Humber River has objected to its negotiations with Branson. They have sent a letter to the administration accusing them of abandoning Northwestern Hospital in the city of York in favor of Branson. Northwestern is also to be closed.

The Branson executive is optimistic that admitting privileges for Branson's specialists will be obtained at Humber River and at North York General.

"We're doing everything we can to make sure that Branson's family doctors get admitting privileges at other hospitals. This has to be explored, but we do not expect a great deal of difficulty," Fenton said.

The commission has allotted funding to Humber River, North York General and York Central in Richmond Hill to handle Branson patients.

Sixty percent of Branson's emergency and medical cases are slated for Humber River, and 30 percent for North York General. In the case of surgical patients, half would go to each. Seventy percent of women giving birth are slated for North York General, 20 percent for Humber River and 10 percent for York Central.

About 250-300 medical personnel at Branson, including the 100 specialists, are involved in the changes, Fenton said.

Beth Jacob celebrates 100th anniversary

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It started, as so many Toronto synagogues did, as a minyan of Jews from the same area in Europe, in this case Poland.

Now it is 100 years later, and Beth Jacob Congregation in Bathurst Manor is still going strong.

To celebrate the milestone, the shul is planning a dinner on June 26 at the synagogue. Guest speaker will be Rabbi Berel Wein, and there will be a musical interlude with Chazzan Moshe Ginz, and Yehuda Gilden and the Eitz Chaim Boys Choir.

The dinner will also honor Rabbi Moshe Burak and past presidents of the shul, brotherhood and sisterhood.

The Jewish community in Toronto in 1897 was not only ethnically diverse, but also ethnically divided. The Russian Jews davened together, as did the Galicians, Germans and Poles. As Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovitz, general studies principal of Eitz Chaim Schools, a member of Beth Jacob who is preparing a history of the synagogue for its 100th anniversary celebrations, says, "They davened in their own minyan, because that's how things were."

The group formed an official congregation in 1899, calling themselves Bais Jakov. In 1905, they bought a small church on Elm Street just east of Yonge, which they turned into their first home.

By the end of World War I, the number of Polish Jews had greatly increased and in 1919, the congregation bought larger quarters on Henry Street.

"It was opened in 1922 with a major ceremony," Rabbi Jakobovitz said. "Chazzan Yosselle Rosenblatt [a noted chazzan from New York] and his choir came. A thousand people were inside the shul and another 1,000 stood outside."

Stephen Speisman, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, and author of The Jews of Toronto, considers the Henry Street shul to have been one of the most beautful shuls in Toronto, with its stained glass windows, columns painted to look like gold leaf, wall paintings, and especially its magnificent Aron Kodesh.

The congregation stayed there for 40 years. After the Jewish community began to move north, Beth Jacob joined Shaarei Emunah Congregation at Wilmington and Overbrook in 1965.

The Aron Kodesh was dismantled and reassembled in the new facility. The congregation found the company that originally built it and still had the original plans. The company's staff took it apart piece by piece and stored it until it was needed.

The first spiritual leader of Beth Jacob was Rabbi Yehuda Leib Graubart, who was brought to Toronto from Poland. After he left in the 1940s, there was no rabbi until Rabbi Benjamin Hauer took over for a time in the 1950s.

Rabbi Moshe Burak has led the congregation since 1962. He remembers being not just the rabbi, but the baal Musaf as well.

"When I came, there was declining attendance, but it came back to life. My wife founded the sisterhood, and the Sunday morning brotherhood meetings were smashing affairs," Rabbi Burak said.

When the shul first considered moving from downtown, the rabbi said, "I wanted them to move to Steeles. But one of my balabatim said that every time he went to the Murray House [then on Steeles just west of Bathurst], he got lost. So we didn't move there."

Last year, Rabbi Jay Kelman was appointed associate rabbi. He has instituted many new programs in an effort to revitalize the congregation and to attract new, and hopefully some younger members.

There is a beginners' minyan, a youth minyan, a greatly expanded adult education program, including sessions in people's houses, and a lunch-and-learn program.

There is also a home buyers incentive plan, in which new home buyers who are interested in joining the shul can receive an interest-free loan.

Rabbi Burak praised Rabbi Kelman as "a scholar, and the descendent of great scholars."

Asked whether Rabbi Kelman's appointment meant that he would be slowing down, he replied with a laugh: "I want him to be successful, so that I can go around the world seeing my grandchildren."

Superior Parliament

The Parliament that resulted from last week's election is a far superior one to that which it replaced. We can think of a number of reasons why this is so. Here are merely eight.

First, the government enjoys a majority. This is important because it adds a measure of certainty to the life of the government. But the majority is sufficiently slim that the Liberals will never be able to be so certain as to allow complacency or arrogance to set in.

Second, Canadians no longer face the surrealistic spectre of having as their "official" Opposition, a party officially committed to the dismantling of our country.

Third, each of the federalist parties will have full party status and be able to express its voice in the House of Commons.

Fourth, the separatist presence in the House of Commons has been substantially diminished. So too was its popular base among the voters of Quebec, suggesting the possibility that a reinvigorated and rejuvenated federalism would be warmly received there.

Fifth, though each of the four federalist parties can rightly point to their respective electoral success, each also suffered major setbacks over which they must also feel somewhat chastened.

Sixth, to deal with these setbacks and to eventually overcome them, the four federalist parties must demonstrate a certain flexibility and a willingness to "adapt." For example, if the Reform party hopes to make any headway with Ontario voters, it must abjure the shameful, divisive anti-Quebec rhetoric on which it campaigned. If the Liberals want to make better headway in the West, they must assess the reasons for their apparent lack of appeal there.

Seventh, this need for flexibility must inevitably lead to more cooperation among at least some of the parties on social, economic and especially, constitutional legislative initiatives.

And eighth, the agenda is already highly focussed. Staying the course on deficit reduction will create economic conditions conducive to job creation. This in turn, will enable the restoration to some reasonable extent, of more health, social, educational and welfare spending. But most important, before too long, Premier Lucien Bouchard will seek his own mandate in Quebec to hold The Third Referendum. Whatever the pretext, whatever the ploy, whatever the demagogic device by which he justifies his call to arms, the most effective response to him will be a strong, federalist parliament whose members can stand opposite him on his own territory.

Thus, while many observers are predicting a fractious Parliament, we do not. No doubt there will be the routine display of question period theatrics, insult and bravado, especially in the early months of the Parliament. But after the initial rush of name-calling and feigned umbrage, we are counting on our elected representatives to demonstrate the requisite maturity, to recognize and fully understand the somberness and the seriousness of their responsibility. That responsibility will be nothing less than saving the country.

At that moment, theatrics will have to give way to thoughtfulness, insult to inventiveness, and bravado to bravery. Canadians will demand of our elected representatives a heightened, more sophisticated and sensitized leadership that rises to the urgency of the hour. We will expect our leaders not to point a finger, but rather to point the way; not to show a fist, but rather, to extend a hand.

Any leader who sets party or personal interests before the national interest will be scorned by the majority of Canadians and by history and deservedly so.

Bernard Rubin (CJN, May 29 letter), challenged a statement I made regarding the Conservative movement's commitment to Halachah. Rubin asserted: "To put the term Halachah in the same sentence as Conservative Judaism is an oxymoron." He continued, "The religion, as defined by the Halachah... is basically a dictatorial religion." The Conservative movement, he charged, "has changed these laws (regarding women) for themselves. To couch these changes under the umbrella of Halachah is contrary to the religion."

What is truly oxymoronic is to relate the words "Halachah" and "dictatorial." That is to say, while Halachah does indeed govern the way in which we lead our lives as Jews, any student of Judaism would recognize that Halachah is not an unchanging or univocal code of law. Open any page of Talmud and you will be surrounded by differing visions of God's will and divergent interpretations of rabbinic law. The richness of Halachah is in large part due to these myriad perspectives, insights and values that generations of rabbis continue to bring to it. To think that Halachah is a motionless or single-minded dictatorial body of law is not only to misunderstand Halachah's sacred mission of maintaining the relevance of the Torah, it is to deny the evolutionary and multifaceted growth that Halachah has undergone over the past 2,000 years.

Indeed, the very texts Rubin cites as proof of Halachah's objective, uncontested stance on the role of women in ritual, the Mishnah Torah, the Shulchan Aruch and Mishnah Berurah, themselves reflect generations of evolutionary, pluralistic halachic discourse.

Halachic texts, by the way, and their interpretation, do not belong exclusively to the Orthodox. They belong to any Jew who takes their content seriously and to any rabbi who has been authorized by his or her community to study, interpret and apply them.

Halachah remains central to Conservative Judaism. Why this statement conjures up such fierce emotion in Rubin is curious indeed. In this time of divisiveness, let's celebrate our common commitments rather than waste Jewish energy using them to further separate us.

Two Bernard Rubins are not clones

I was surprised and amused to read the letter headed "Objects to Conservative use of Halachah" written by my namesake (CJN, May 29). There are two Bernard Rubins living on the same street in Downsview. I am a Conservative Jew and have already received phone calls from friends asking if I really wrote that letter. In the past we have been confused over letters to the editor in both The Canadian Jewish News and the Globe and Mail. Perhaps one of us should adopt a middle initial.

Other villains in war crimes story

The article Judicial Independence Revisited, by Paul Lungen (CJN, May 29), raises some very troubling and serious issues.

A person not concerned with the rule of law or knowledgeable about the workings of the judicial system might well explain away the transgressions within the Ministry of Justice and the fumbling and stumbling by various members of the Federal Court of Canada with the comment that they are simply doing their best to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. In reality, the opposite is true. The accumulation of missteps and judicial ineptness might well lead the Supreme Court of Canada to exonerate at least three accused Nazi war criminals without ever hearing the merits of the case against them or even considering the horrific crimes that they have committed.

The minister of justice's decision not to prosecute alleged Nazi war criminals was wrong. Instead the government decided that denaturalization and deportation was the only course left. These cases are not a bureaucratic concern about a number of immigrants who withheld some trivial information in order to gain entry to Canada and then become Canadian citizens. This is the vehicle the federal government has chosen to prosecute perpetrators of crimes against humanity and mass murder. For this objective to be sidetracked because senior lawyers are unaware of the obligation to advise an adversary of a visit to a judge's chambers or for judges to sit on their hands for months and months while the memory of witnesses fade and accused persons die of old age only adds to the abysmal record of one federal government after another in dealing with the entire Nazi war crimes issue.

One of the few people within the Ministry of Justice who has toiled and fought to see Nazi war criminals brought to justice is chief war crimes litigator, Christopher Amerasinghe. He has bucked political inertia and ministers who would like the entire issue terminated and now he has come forward with the courage to even take on the minister of justice. Some day, I predict we will hear even more from him and it will become clear that there were in addition to the Nazi war criminals many other villains in Canada's sorry history of war crimes prosecutions.

Hillel Zeitlin was a remarkable thinker, scholar and journalist whose writings plumbed the depths of the most holy, and also explored the world of the secular. He was born in 1871 in Korma, Belarus, and died on the way to Treblinka in 1942, wearing his tallit and t'fillin, on erev Rosh Hashanah.

His meditation on Tikkun Hazot reaches to the very centre of individual Jewish existence and experience.

It is a fitting prelude to our studies and to our celebration of Shavuot.

MEDITATION

Weeping and true joy struggle with each other at Tikkun Hazot, the midnight vigil. Softly, I tell you, there is one kind of midnight vigil in which there's no need to squat on the floor or place ashes on your head.

The place for it is on a mountain, at the edge of a forest; the time, when the moon is covered by clouds and the stars are concealed and invisible.

Shadows of darkness cover everything. There are no separate trees or flowers, not a separate creature.

A deep silence is before you, the silence of pure thought, the silence of creation, the silence of eternity.

There is no movement, no murmur, no agitation, no noise and emotion, no developing and growing, for all is being, and only being.

There is no changing of form, maturation and decay, transformation and alteration; there is only the whole universe.

You want to grasp in your thought the essence of existence, of reality, of eternity.

You sink into this thought, and labor to give it some image you can hold on to.

But from far away you hear the echo of various sounds that recall the perpetual flow of life.

Far away from where you are sitting, the brook rushes, the spring murmurs, the bird chirps, the insects rustle, the leaves talk, and the winds meet.

And you understand the secrets of rest and of motion, the secret of reality and of the modes of reality, the secret of existence and of the manifestation of existence, the secrets of creation and form.

And you sense all the sadness and all the joy of eternity.

And the night's talk tells you about the pure blood that has been spilt throughout all the ages: about the travail and distress of those who have always been miserable and exploited, abused and humiliated; about the terrible suffering, the troubles and afflictions that have been going on endlessly; and about the victims who are still falling to your left and to your right, every minute.

The time is not for wonder and amazement and excitement, but for weeping, the weeping of silence, weeping of bitterness, weeping of the world, weeping of eternity.

But you also hear in the night's talk about the eternity of all that is holy and pure, beautiful and sublime, exalted and supernal; about the noble and holy emotions, and holy visions, and holy intentions, and all the great holy deeds and projects.

And the night's talk reveals to you that everything comes together, is connected, unites, that there is no noble feeling or good intention that is completely lost, no holy aspiration that will not at some stage be redeemed.

You realize that everything is imprinted in eternity.

And when the Holy One Blessed Be He goes into the Garden of Eden to delight with His Righteous Ones, and those beings on high and below are aroused to Him, and when the trees of Eden break out in song to Him, you also hear the murmuring of the spring of tears.

And you feel all the sorrows and grief, and also consolation of the holy and the supernal beauty.

A boon and a blessing

By Carl Alpert in Israel

There can be no doubt that the immigration into Israel of over 700,000 people from the former Soviet Union (FSU) during less than a decade, has been a boon and a blessing to the country from every point of view, economic, cultural and national security. Once again the Zionist movement has justified its basic philosophy of providing a safe haven for any Jew, anywhere in the world, who requires or wishes for a home.

The cost has not been small, but Israelis bear the heavy burden and world Jewry has risen to the challenge generously. Who measures cost when there are lives to be saved?

The pace of the immigration has tapered off considerably, but the financial needs do not appear to have diminished much. Why?

Social workers to whom we have spoken in various parts of the country tell us that in recent months there has been a marked increase in the number of olim suffering from physical, medical, mental and social problems. At the moment there is urgent need to provide adequate, modest flats for over 14,500 elderly immigrants — that is, men and women who are far beyond productive age, and have no families with whom to live. Indeed, one observer commented that it seems as if the healthy, able-bodied younger Jews in Russia and the neighboring states, now beginning to adjust themselves to the new atmosphere there, find it convenient to ship the old and ailing members of their families off to Israel, where they know they will be well cared for.

Israel's medical services have become famous in Eastern Europe, and many come here hoping for miracle cures. Health facilities where they come from have for some years been in a depressed state, lacking much of the modern equipment. The result, as a survey conducted by the JDC-Brookdale Institute of Gerontology has revealed, is that new immigrants arrive here with chronic conditions that have been long neglected, and with health damaged by years of inadequate preventive medicine and unhealthy diets.

The same survey reported that nearly half of the older olim said they had a chronic disease, a handicap or other limitation, compared to 30 percent of veteran Israelis.

These immigrants live under depressed conditions, they do not know the language nor can they ever learn. They tend to become permanent burdens on the local authorities. Life is far from pleasant for them. Questions are being asked: Is such an aliyah really of benefit to the unfortunate and unhappy men and women who are brought here or as indicated earlier, sent off by their families who don't want to be burdened with them?

We posed questions to the Jewish Agency. Is there a policy to encourage or discourage aliyah by "hardship cases"? Are the shlichim, the Jewish Agency emissaries, given a free hand in encouraging and promoting such aliyah, perhaps to inflate the statistics?

The replies, from official sources, did not sidestep the problem. "Jewish Agency policy regarding world-wide immigration is strictly non-selective. According to the stipulations of Israel's Law of Return, every Diaspora Jew has the right to come 'home' to Israel." Once the eligibility is confirmed, the Jewish Agency assists their aliyah and initial resettlement. Once they are in Israel, the government Ministry of Absorption assumes most responsibility for their welfare.

Furthermore, the shlichim are instructed to be realistic in preparing all potential olim for the changes and difficulties they can expect in uprooting themselves from their families and native lands and re-establishing themselves, socially, professionally and personally in Israel.

As for the feeling that those coming now are the elderly, Jewish Agency statistics do not bear this out. The percentage of immigrants from the FSU ages 65 and over, actually dropped from 14 percent in 1995 to 13 percent in 1996 and 11 percent thus far this year. No figures were made available on health conditions.

To the question, is this aliyah beneficial to Israel, or to the sick and aged olim themselves, the only reply appears to be a humanitarian and Jewish one: It is their right to come home.

One is reminded of Emma Lazarus' famous words inscribed on the base of the American Statue of Liberty: "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free, the wretched refuse of your teeming shore, send these, the homeless, tempest-tost, to me..."

Black policeman an innovator

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The other day I was given an article that was published in the Toronto Star. Written by Martin Walker it originated in Charleston, S.C. Even if you already know the story, it is worth taking another look at it.

The tale plays out in this old southern city where the American Civil War started 136 years ago, and is accompanied by a large picture of a handsome gentleman in police uniform. The fact that the police officer is also black is certainly no news, nor even that he is chief of police — something that is found in a number of American cities. But he is also Jewish and his name is Reuben Greenberg. That combination certainly made me attentive to the story.

The American South is still not a hospitable place for blacks, and black police chiefs who are Jewish are not what one would expect in a stronghold of social and political tradition. Greenberg's Jewishness derives from his black great-grandmother with whom his great-grandfather Sol fell in love many years ago. The newspaper adds that the chief is still an Orthodox Jew, like his ancestor, which is additionally piquant, because Charleston is also the birthplace of the first Reform synagogue, in the 1820s.

The chief is, in fact, fast becoming well-known throughout the States and now has found recognition in Canada as well. For he has accomplished the impossible: he has dramatically reduced crime in the city, and has done the same for children's truancy. Drug dealing is also down since he put an officer on all the streets where the drug trade previously flourished, and soon there was no hideout for the would-be dealer. Strangest of all, in a part of America's landscape where possession of guns is nearly universal, only one child has suffered a violent death — and that by an adult.

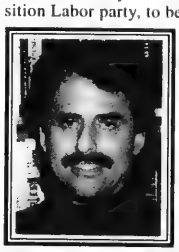
Handguns disappeared from schools when the chief announced a $100 reward for any child who reported another with a weapon. Greenberg apparently knows something that psychologists discovered some time ago — that children are proverbial snitchers. "Before, the more people who knew you had a gun, the greater your prestige. Now, the more people who know, the more likely you are to be turned in."

Once upon a time,Greenberg was a professor of sociology who, at one point in his career, decided to put his insights to practical tests. His cops are not in automobiles but wear running shoes so they can chase suspects more easily, and he himself wears in-line skates to speed up his own record of apprehending offenders.

Meanwhile, although Charleston's citizens are happy with the chief's performance, they are also worried about him. Not about his ways of handling public welfare, but that another city will come along and hire him away.

I'd like to think that Greenberg's Jewishness is part of his success. For it does teach a sense of right and wrong as well as creating a keen social conscience. Combined with a flair for the unusual, and being given latitude to exercise his imagination, this has worked wonders. Maybe these can be transported elsewhere as well.

Labor leader sports military elan



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

Who is Ehud Barak? The former military chief of staff was recently elected to lead the opposition Labor party, to be the "Great White Hope" of the Israeli political left. While Barak advocates the standard Labor belief in trading West Bank land for peace, even recognizing the prospect of Palestinian statehood, his political skills remain to be tested.

In the military the ultra-ambitious Barak was described as a man who moves in life from "post to post," from chief of staff to leader of the Labor party onto the premiership and then — if he could change his birthplace — to the American presidency.

Definitely armed with an incredible intellect, Barak may be too smart for his own good. He has a tendency to relate to the political environment as he did to the military, a dynamic which will not run well in the all too compromising reality of Israeli politics. His fellow Laborites and potential coalition partners will not take too well to "receiving orders."

But his military elan will go very well with the Israeli public. Barak has that extra measure of "political testosterone" that is so lacking in the former Labor prime minister Shimon Peres.

Pitted against Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in Israeli public opinion polls, Barak would clearly defeat the prime minister in a national election. While that does show popularity, the capricious nature of Israeli voters is such that they can quickly shift support from one candidate to the other. The polls by no means confirm a Labor victory under Barak's leadership.

What I do like about Barak as opposed to Netanyahu is what he describes as the most pressing need in the peace process, the need to rebuild the shattered trust with the Arabs. There can be no progress in negotiations nor movement in the peace process without some measure of mutual trust.

Sending the bulldozers to start construction of the Jewish community of Har Choma was the coup de grace that killed any chance of real trust between Netanyahu and Arab Leaders. There is such deep suspicion between the current Israeli and Arab leaderships, the chance of even minimal progress is slim at best.

Barak believes Israel must take confidence building measures to regenerate that trust, measures to freeze settlements, and a genuine desire to grant the Palestinians more self rule in return for peace.

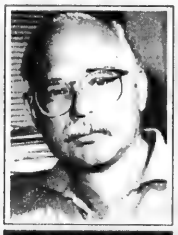
Netanyahu, on the other hand, believes the Palestinians must first change their fundamental national character before there can be trust. At that rate, peace will come at about the same time as the arrival of the Messiah.

For now, the choice is strictly academic. With elections scheduled in the year 2000, Netanyahu still has three years to harness, or erode, support for his leadership. And as we all know, the Mideast is full of surprises and hidden twist and turns which could make or break the current government.

The Kirshner File

The conscience of a nation

Call her, if you like, the conscience of her nation. Verena Grendelmeier, a member of the Swiss federal parliament, has been in the forefront of efforts by Switzerland to come to grips with its ambiguous past.



By Sheldon Kirshner

In March 1995, she was the first parliamentarian to urge Swiss banks to return Jewish dormant funds. In January of this year, she raised the idea of a state-endowed foundation to help the victims of oppression and impoverishment in Switzerland and abroad.

Her proposals have touched raw nerves but have been heeded.

Last year, the Swiss Bankers Association, the World Jewish Congress and the World Restitution Organization agreed to establish a commission of eminent persons, headed by Paul Volcker, to study the long-lingering question of dormant funds.

Volcker, former chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve, is expected to submit a final report next summer.

Three months ago, the president of Switzerland, Arnold Koller, called for the creation of a $4.7 billion (US) Swiss Foundation for Solidarity fund to assist "victims of poverty and catastrophes, of genocide and other severe breaches of human rights, such as, of course, victims of the Holocaust."

Born in Zurich in the year World War II broke out, Grendelmeier has been a parliamentarian since 1983. Not by coincidence, she represents the Independence party, which holds five seats in the 200-member National Council.

She is an imposing person, tall and feisty and fearless. Unmarried, she lives modestly in a singularly small and unprepossessing flat in a sedate, tree-lined neighborhood in Zurich, a neat and attractive city from whose lake the majestic, snow-capped Alps can be glimpsed. On a recent afternoon, I spent two hours talking with her, pausing only to sample her wholesome home-cooked soup with slices of crusty bread.

As she tells it, the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II was a fitting occasion to address an issue which had been simmering on the back burner: dormant accounts held by Jews who had been murdered during the Holocaust.

Their descendants had put in claims, but lacking death certificates and the necessary documents, they had been rebuffed by officious Swiss banks, leading to accusations that the bankers were deliberately sitting on the accounts.

"Things weren't as they should have been," said Grendelmeier. "There was a problem and it had to be dealt with." And so she introduced a motion in committee to expedite matters. "It was the fastest way to get an answer."

The first hearing took place 11 months later, a delay she attributes to jealousy on the part of fellow parliamentarians. "We lost time. We could have given the world a clear sign of our intentions, before Sen. Alphonse D'Amato (of the U.S. Senate banking committee) appeared on the scene."

There was a debate in parliament, and both chambers voted unanimously to create the Volcker Commission.

On Jan. 27, 1997, she unveiled her second major initiative, the solidarity foundation, as a token of thanks for the suffering and deprivations Switzerland, a neutral country, did not have to endure during the war. Grendelmeier, who did not put a dollar value on her proposal, discussed it with the foreign minister, Flavio Cotti, who seemed impressed.

On March 5, the government officially adopted Grendelmeier's proposition, but it is far from assured of passage.

Proposals were heeded

Blocher and his allies have two basic objections. They regard the foundation as an unjustified admission of Swiss guilt for its wartime behavior. They oppose using public funds — Swiss gold reserves — to finance it.

Switzerland bought plundered European gold from Germany in exchange for convertible Swiss francs. These transactions enabled Germany to buy war material from the neutral powers and, in the view of historians, to prolong the war. Switzerland admitted tens of thousands of refugees, including 30,000 Jews. But it turned away an equal number of Jewish refugees.

Grendelmeier, who has vivid memories of the restrictions and rationing the war imposed on Switzerland, realizes that the proposed foundation is on shaky ground.

"The problem with our political system is that it's so democratic," she explained. "With a petition signed by 50,000 citizens, the issue can be taken to a referendum."

Verena Grendelmeier

In a 1992 referendum, she recalled, the Swiss rejected membership in the European Union. The campaign was spearheaded by none other than Blocher, whose party is represented in the Swiss Federal Council, Switzerland's ruling body.

Right now, even though debate concerning the proposed foundation has hardly even begun, public opinion is split right down the middle, Grendelmeier said.

Some of the dissenters are Swiss males over the age of 75 who faithfully guarded the borders as soldiers and now feel that Switzerland's honor is being impugned.

Grendelmeier, who is nothing if not empathetic, understands their grievance. "Switzerland was surrounded by fascist countries, and to survive it had to cooperate with Germany. This was a blackmail situation for us. We were in a hopeless situation."

Nevertheless, the Swiss government of the day was too accommodating. "We didn't have to cooperate with Germany after 1943 and 1944. We didn't have to accept every German dictate. We went too far in being compliant."

Echoing a view that is quite common here, Grendelmeier believes that neither the Swiss government nor the Swiss population was pro-German. "We hated the Germans. We felt menaced by them. We feared an Anschluss."

She regards Switzerland's overall treatment of Jewish refugees as a "shameful chapter" in its history.

"The boat was not full," she said, referring to rationalizations that Switzerland would be swamped by refugees. She is convinced that an element of anti-Semitism informed Switzerland's policy vis-a-vis Jewish refugees.

In the past two years, Grendelmeier has received threatening telephone calls and a steady stream of hate mail from irate letter writers, several of whom have accused her of being a "Jewish whore."

Despite this outpouring of bile, she does not detect an anti-Semitic backlash in the country at large. Swiss Jews, she added, have played an exceedingly positive role as a credible intermediary between Switzerland and the Jewish world.

Grendelmeier strongly believes that the current controversy over Nazi gold will ultimately be of benefit to Switzerland, which is currently in the painful process of working through its past.

"It is forcing us to see things as they really were and not as we would have liked to see them. The Swiss are disengaging themselves from the tyranny of self-deception, and that's good. Then we can look forward instead of backwards."

As I stood up to leave, she said emphatically, "We have to close this chapter."

Roth's sombre drama

American Pastoral*, by Philip Roth (Thomas Allen Pub., $34.95).

Roth's impressive and affecting new novel, his 18th, is a searing evocation of the United States during a pivotal decade, as well as the tragedy of a decent, generous, hard-working, patriotic citizen who is brought down by malignant forces beyond his knowledge or control.

The book's title is ironic, for there is nothing pastoral in the conflicts and violent transitions of the 1960s that are at the heart of its sombre drama.

His daughter, Meredith (Merry), the apple of his eye, becomes radicalized during the Vietnam war and rails against the sheltered complacency of bourgeois life. In a series of terrible actions — reminiscent of those by Patty Hearst — she plants a bomb that blows up a rural post office and kills an innocent passing physician. She becomes an underground fugitive for five years and during that time she kills three additional people in her fanatical allegiance to her cause.

"Swede" and his family are flung "out of the longed-for American pastoral and into everything that is its antithesis and its enemy — into the fury, the violence and the desperation of the counterpastoral — into the American berserk."

Merry eventually reappears as a half-starved Jain, sick and filthy, living in sacred poverty in Newark, her mouth covered with a veil lest she ingest any micro-organisms. As her father awakens to the knowledge of Merry's monstrous actions, his once sheltered life undergoes shattering torment.

He confronts his daughter: " 'You are not an Algerian woman! You are not from Algeria and you are not from India! You are an American girl from Old Rimrock, New Jersey! A very, very screwed-up American Girl! Four people? No!...' He could never father a child who killed four people. Everything life had provided her, everything life offered her, everything life demanded of her, everything that had happened to her from the day she was born made that impossible. Killing people? It was not one of their problems."

Nothing that Roth writes is without intricacy and convolution. This is true of American Pastoral, where the entire story — in realistic and fine detail — is imaginatively reconstructed and narrated by Nathan Zuckerman, Roth's alter-ego, as he dreams "a realistic chronicle" of the well-remembered hero of his youth.

This is, arguably, the most Jewishly positive of Roth's novels. It includes a remarkable nine-page interrogation of Dawn Dwyer — about to marry his son — by "Swede's" father on her religious views and observances. What will happen when they are married? Some kind of contract must be made. In which religion will the children be reared? What about baptism? Bar mitzvah? Christmas? Communion?

Today, nearly three decades and 20 books after Portnoy's Complaint, Roth seems to have found an affirmative identification with his Jewish roots.

Quite unlike Roth's last novel, Sabbath's Theatre and eschewing his customary emphasis on sexuality, brilliant comic turns and black humor, American Pastoral is a richly textured and sagely reasoned narrative of American life at the end of this century. When "Swede" Levov in his anguish cries out, "What the hell is wrong with doing things right?", the sympathetic reader senses the crumbling of the American dream.

Diplomatically Speaking

By JEHUDI KINAR

Diplomatic links

The establishment of diplomatic links between countries is only the most visible form of international cooperation. Without media fanfare or ceremony, thousands of Israeli experts in agriculture, health care, environmental technology and other specialized fields have been meeting with their counterparts in the developing world since the 1950s.

Under the aegis of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Centre for International Cooperation (MASHAV in Hebrew) has forged close ties between Israelis and trainees from Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Mediterranean region. Israeli experts give on-the-spot courses in the other countries or trainees come to Israel to study. In 1995, there were 3,628 trainees studying in Israel and another 6,262 enrolled in MASHAV courses in 55 countries around the world.

It all started when Golda Meir, as foreign minister of Israel, visited Africa in 1958. Meir recognized many similarities between the challenges faced by newly indepedent African nations and Israeli efforts to build a new society. Because Israel was, in the period after independence, still itself a developing country, MASHAV was based on a cooperative, rather than a paternalistic approach to development assistance. While wealthy countries might give money, Israel has focused on sharing its technical expertise, particularly in agriculture.

Some of the 143 countries involved in MASHAV do not have diplomatic relations with Israel, but Israelis hope that goodwill can be forged on the ground.

MASHAV has developed a vast array of projects: a dairy cattle farm in El Salvador, a model farm in Chuta, a field-course on irrigation in Brazil, an eye-surgery centre in Namibia and a desalinization centre in Oman are just a few examples. In each country, Israelis work alongside their colleagues in the spirit of cooperation. MASHAV stresses that trainees "adapt rather than adopt" Israeli technology and methods to suit needs and conditions.

Over the past few years, MASHAV has shifted to a focus on joint projects with Israel's neighbors in the Middle East and North Africa. Here the intention is to address issues of regional concern, like combating desertification and preventing environmental degradation.

Last year, MASHAV conducted its first course in Morocco. Agricultural projects in Egypt have led to discussions of a joint Egyptian-Israeli marketing scheme for agricultural produce. A new priority is to strengthen cooperative efforts with the Palestinian Authority through building ties between Palestinian and Israeli professionals. MASHAV has also become increasingly active in the former East Bloc countries which had been closed to Israel since the 1967 Six Day War.

The courses offered are not always technical and scientific. Trainees can also study drug abuse prevention, science education in early childhood, youth leadership, and the use of media in community development. MASHAV is also distinctive for its attention to the role of women in developing societies. A couple of months ago, a delegation of Israeli women teachers met with their Jordanian colleagues to discuss future cooperation. One MASHAV course deals with the promotion of self-help economic initiatives by women.

The success of MASHAV is a reminder that international cooperation can be achieved by many means, and that not only diplomats, but also ordinary citizens, may contribute to the achievement of good relations between countries.

Special kids' needs explored

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The pain and frustration of parenting children with special needs boiled over at an all-day conference on Jewish education last week at Baycrest Terrace.

Parents shouted and cried as they told stories of schools refusing to accept their children, other youngsters refusing to play with them and people they had considered friends avoiding a baby with a disability.

The conference was sponsored by Cha'yil, an organization of parents and teachers who represent children with learning disabilities, developmental delays, attention deficit disorder and physical and emotional challenges, and by Canadian Friends of P'Tach. P'Tach arranges special education for children with special needs in certain day schools in the United States.

Separate workshops were held for parents and teachers. The groups came together for the opening address by Rabbi Yitzchok Feigenbaum, who explained the halachic obligation to educate all children, regardless of what handicaps they might have; for a luncheon address by Judith Kimlichman, a Montreal parent; and for the keynote speech by Rabbi Yaakov Bender of Far Rockaway, N.Y.

Participants were visibly and vocally upset by the poor turnout of community teachers and principals, although there were contingents from at least She'arim, Zareinu, and Eitz Chaim schools.

Rabbi Aaron Levine, senior principal of Eitz Chaim, almost in tears, told the audience gathered for Rabbi Bender's speech that "principals are crying too. We want to reach out to every single child."

Kimlichman's son Chaim, now in his early 20s, suffered from a lack of oxygen at birth and is brain damaged. She remembers that when when she brought him home from the hospital, "no one came to visit, no one called. When I took him out in his carriage, people crossed to the other side of the street."

When the yeshivah they sent him to asked her and her husband to take him out, "I told them if you can find a rabbi to paskin [give a halachic ruling] that we should take him out, we will."

No one, she said, acknowledged the anger, the feeling of loss and the uncertainty parents of children with special needs face. "Should we take him out of the day school system? Should we keep fighting?"

No one, she went on, realized that parents of children with special needs also have a normal family life and have to deal with the ordinary demands made on any family unit.

"When we needed to spend 20 hours helping Chaim, we were torn. What do we do first?"

And no one, she said, asked whether they needed help with the other children in the family.

To help other families cope with these situations, Kimlichman helped found, and now directs, the Jewish Association for Special Education (JASE).

Bottom line

She explained that JASE has a full-time resource room for children from all parts of the community, which meets in Bais Yaakov school, and offers full-time education for the handicapped and part-time for the learning disabled.

What really helped the program succeed, she said, is that "the principal took it to heart. Others see only the bottom financial line."

It is also important, she said, to be aware of the strain on a couple dealing with a special needs child. "It is important to help them with respite and support. Their feeling of isolation can lead to illness and divorce."

Carol Goldman, co-director of Zareinu, said that while she advocates inclusion, that is, educating children with special needs along with all the others, "it is no good if they just take up desk space."

These children, she said, must first be given the tools they need to be able to take advantage of regular programs, such as speech, occupational and physiotherapy and other necessary resources to help them.

"You don't need to apologize or grovel [to day school administrators]. Your child has the right to a Jewish education."

She slammed those who claim that devoting scarce resources to handicapped children is unfair to the non-handicapped. "Fair is everyone having equal opportunities."

Zareinu, she said, has proposed to the Board of Jewish Education that it operate a cost-effective resource program in the day schools, one that would be able to function with minimal disruption.

"They have never answered us," she said.

Another problem she identified, and that was taken up by the parents in attendance, was the fear by some parents and administrators that if a school accepts children with special needs, the reputation of the school will be hurt.

Rabbi Bender, who is the principal of Yeshivat Darchei Torah in Far Rockaway, said his school has about 110 special needs children out of a population of 730, and "the yeshivah has suffered for that. Other yeshivot play off us that ours takes in the handicapped."

However, that does not deter him, as he believes that the children learn a great deal from having children with special needs in their classes.

He told touching stories of acts of kindness his students had performed: the baseball game in which the opposing team managed things so that a severely retarded youngster could make a home run; a boy who explained that he was not playing around during Rabbi Bender's class — he was repeating the lesson in sign language for his deaf friend; getting a specially equipped van so that a family with two children with muscular dystrophy could get around.

He echoed Goldman's injunction not to feel apologetic about demanding special services. "If your child needs an aide, it is the school's job to give it, just like it is the school's job to supply crossing guards."

Beth Sholom marks 50 years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Beth Sholom Synagogue recently marked its golden anniversary with an afternoon of nostalgia.

Hebrew school teachers, students, former clergy and friends joined Beth Sholom members at the reunion open house, where people reminisced about the early days, watched old videos of synagogue events and admired an exhibition of synagogue memorabilia, including old photographs, shul bulletins and newspaper clippings, all of which will be on display for a year.

Retiring synagogue president Alan Zelunka praised Sandra and Bernie Parl for their efforts in mounting the exhibition, which was the focal point of the reunion.

Hebrew teacher Miriam Shames, who taught at the Beth Sholom Mildred Arnoff Hebrew School from 1956 to 1994, was greeted by many of her former students.

Rabbi Louis Schechter, who formerly served at the synagogue; assistant rabbi emeritus Mendel Kirshenblatt; and interim rabbi Irvin Beigel were also on hand.

"It's wonderful to see so many people here who have a real sense of history about the congregation," Rabbi Beigel said. "There are people here who were instrumental in founding and building the congregation."

One of those people was Mac Shore, the first president of the congregation, who talked about Beth Sholom's humble beginnings.

The dozen or so families who founded the congregation held services in the basement of a grocery store, Shore said. "I got up to make a speech; so they made me the president."

Shore became involved with the congregation after rabbi emeritus David Monson, Beth Sholom's founding rabbi, approached him about starting a new congregation.

"Rabbi Monson was officiating at my sister's wedding. He heard me make a speech and he said, 'I need a guy like you.'"

Beth Sholom has grown from the original 12 families to a membership of 1,100 households.

The annual Beth Sholom Brotherhood Humanitarian Award dinner, a 46-year tradition, has honored many public figures, among them, former prime ministers John Turner and the late John Diefenbaker, former Ontario premier Bob Rae, and Mila Mulroney.

Don Latchman, chair of the reunion, said he was pleased with the turnout at the open house, the kick-off event for a year of anniversary festivities. The major event will be the 50th anniversary dinner in November to honor rabbis Monson and Kirshenblatt.

Toronto expected to receive immigrants from FSU republics

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto can expect a high level of Jewish immigration from the former Soviet republics for at least the next few years, the 75th annual meeting of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), Toronto, was told last week.

The agency's annual report says 1997 could see a record in the number of new arrivals JIAS Toronto processes.

The number of newcomers under local JIAS auspices peaked in 1992, when the agency handled 727 families, or 1,507 individuals. JIAS believes that it may handle even more this year.

JIAS Toronto chair Sandra Atlin said the agency opens an average 45 cases a month, 95 percent of them representing emigres from the former Soviet Union.

In the fiscal year 1996-97, most of the newcomers under JIAS auspices came from Russia (45 percent), followed by those from Ukraine (39 percent), Belarus (three percent) and the Baltic states (two percent). Other countries of origin were Serbia, Croatia, Moldova, the former Soviet Asian republics and nations in South America and Eastern Europe. South Africans comprised one percent of the agency's caseload.

Most (65 percent) of the new arrivals JIAS serves arrive in the independent or skilled worker category, followed by 20 percent in the family class division, 10 percent as refugees and the remaining five percent in special categories, such as rarely issued Minister's Permits.

At least 25,000 former Soviet immigrants have arrived in Toronto since the first exodus in the early 1970s, with over 13,000 coming since the second big wave began in 1987.

Sandra Brown, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, brought greetings and announced that JIAS Toronto is now a beneficiary agency of UJA.

As well, the much-praised Community Integration Program at the Bathurst Jewish Centre will come under JIAS control as of July 1, Brown said.

According to the agency, community interest over the years has shifted from settlement alone to long-term integration of newcomers. But JIAS still prides itself on front-line services like its financial assistance program, referrals and furniture bank.

JIAS Toronto's Co-op/Work Experience Program, in which trained newcomers are placed for four months in the labor market, where employers can assess their skills, will be extended, the meeting was told. In the past year, the program made 45 placements.

JIAS Toronto board member Sydney Blinick presented the agency's annual Jack Shindman Scholarship to Iliya Khramov, a fourth year pharmacology student at the University of Toronto.

The 75th annual meeting was mainly a festive affair, with Aelita, a singer of traditional Russian, Yiddish and Hebrew folksongs, bringing the capacity crowd at the Leah Posluns Theatre to its feet.

Army life said difficult despite peace dividends

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite the peace process, soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces continue to carry a tremendous burden, says David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Canada.

"Israel depends on its army and its soldiers for its defence," Sultan told the 550 guests at a tribute dinner presented by the Association for the Soldiers of Israel (ASI), on behalf of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association (CZCA). No other ambassador from Israel to Canada has previously spoken at the organization's annual tribute dinner.

Israel has an army of which it can be proud, Sultan said, "and it always demonstrates full compliance to authority. Israel has not become a military society, but [rather], a vibrant democracy. And the soldiers are not only heroes of war, but heroes of peace. The country's neighbors realize that it is not a passing phenomenon, but that it is here to stay."

Israel is seeking peace with Syria, but it is essential "to remain vigilant so there are no surprises. [As well] the Lebanon border is a front that places a heavy toll on soldiers. We still, therefore, need, soldiers upon whom we can rely. These soldiers deserve the tribute we are paying tonight," the ambassador said.

Jack Muskat, chair of ASI, praised Irving Matlow, chair of CZCA, for his work on behalf of the Toronto branch of ASI. "His work symbolizes the spirit of the Jewish people," Muskat said.

Special dinner guest was Adi Mintz, whose husband Meir, a lieutenant colonel in the Givati Brigade, was killed in the Gaza area by a terrorist bomb when she was pregnant with her second child.

In Israel, she is involved with a holiday camp sponsored by the Toronto branch of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association and operated for the widows and orphans of Israel's fallen soldiers. Proceeds from this year's dinner go towards this project.

Edward Fisch was dinner chair and Jack Muskat ticket chair. Sponsors were Edward and Sylvia Fisch, Max and Susan Moneta and Sally, Frank and Abe Moses.

Former IDF paratrooper turns his disablity into an ability

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Kuti Gershoni was in Toronto recently to promote an organization he says is growing too rapidly.

The 54-year-old former major who served in the IDF Paratroop Engineering Unit before he was injured in 1969, says that although Beit Halochem, Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, turned his life around, far too many soldiers still need its facilities.

Gershoni, whose Toronto visit was sponsored by Beit Halochem Canada, lost both his hands, his sight and most of his hearing after being summoned to dismantle a mine just two days after his son's brit.

"I had two choices after that. I could take pity on myself or I could make the best of it. I chose the latter," says Gershoni, an associate professor of African History at Tel Aviv University on sabbatical this year as a research fellow at Boston University.

Gershoni was also adamant, he recalls, about not revealing the problems of being disabled in public, "unless it could help other people. That is why I am here on behalf of Beit Halochem. That is a mission I must carry on despite my need for privacy."

Beit Halochem, which opened in 1974 in Tel Aviv, now has facilities in Jerusalem, Haifa and Nahariya as well. Although not the first of its kind in the world, says Gershoni, "it is unique in that it is the first to integrate the family. As a facility for the disabled, that is a brand new concept.

"When a person is wounded, his one source of strength and comfort is his family. It is the base on which a disabled person relies. Beit Halochem understood that and has provided programs in which every family member — wives, children, sisters and parents — can participate."

Special Olympics

Beit Halochem opened up avenues for Gershoni, "that allowed me to turn my disability into an ability. Never before had I been an Olympic winner, but there I had the opportunity to take part in Special Olympics [that took place alongside the summer games]. My whole family still takes part in swimming, computer courses, painting — whatever they want.

"The place is designed so people can get around with very little help. Many severely disabled soldiers refer to Beit Halochem as their second home. They can chat with other people in the same situation. The flowing of information between members is an important aspect of the facility."

The organization is doing a lot of work with retired disabled soldiers, says Gershoni. "These people need a lot of support because retirement can be a time of crisis. What will they do without their work? A special program has been designed just for them."

When someone walks into Beit Halochem, he says, they can see immediately that the place is full of life. There are people of all ages and there is a lot of laughter and goodwill."

He stresses, however, that it relies on the Jewish community for funds to maintain its facilities.

"Each member pays [a fee] but it still needs money for equipment, coaches and professional staff.

"Unfortunately, despite two peace agreements, Israel is still at war and people are getting killed and wounded every week. There are over 45,000 disabled soldiers in the country and Beit Halochem is always getting new members. It is the one organization, however, that dreams of getting no new members."

THIS IS A DIFFERENT CENTURY

A Guide to Reconstructionist Judaism

Reconstructionist Judaism developed in North America between the World Wars as the idea of Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan, a visionary teacher at the Jewish Theological Seminary. He viewed 20th-century democracy as an unprecedented challenge to Jewish life, and formulated a kind of Judaism to which Jews could turn in their efforts to reconcile living under democracy with the teachings of Judaism. Blending millennia of inherited traditions and thought together with contemporary ideas about the nature of peoplehood, God, and Torah, he challenged rabbis and lay leaders alike to vitalize the Jewish life by re-examining and re-interpreting basic Jewish texts, beliefs, rituals, and ethics.

At religious services, we continue this tradition of creative engagement, blending traditional practice with "reconstructed" texts. We pray principally in Hebrew, but take care to ensure that those who pray understand what is said and why. The changes we make are consistent with centuries of Jewish embellishment and creative modification of prayer – a process that has occurred throughout Jewish history. Like our ancestors, we make a place in prayer to acknowledge events in our own time, including the Holocaust, the birth of Israel, and the rise of egalitarianism in Jewish community (the first Bat Mitzvah took place in the Reconstructionist movement in 1922). We enrich our services with moments of insight from contemporary thinkers and poets, we add new music, new rituals, and new moments for reflection to enable people to discover that prayer can be a powerful and renewing experience.

Like other Jewish movements, we believe God, Torah and Israel are the pillars of Jewish existence. It is our interpretation of them that makes us unique. Give us a call, or visit. We'd like you to discover our community.

UJA FEDERATION

LEGACY CAMPAIGN: FOCUS ON THE FUTURE

This week UJA Federation unveiled an unprecedented $150 million endowment and capital campaign to guarantee a bright future for Toronto's Jewish community in the 21st century. It will also change the way UJA Federation donors participate in Jewish giving.

Legacy, showcased at UJA Federation's annual meeting, will endeavour to raise $100 million in long-term endowments and $50 million for capital projects such as community, educational and recreational facilities. Legacy will be directed toward a selected list of donors and potential contributors. The Annual Campaign, will, according to Legacy leaders, still provide an opportunity for everyone to assist Jews in need anywhere in the world.

Legacy will ensure a secure source of funds to meet growing needs caused by population growth, especially in York Region; seniors who are living longer and require new kinds of care; inadequate structures and government spending cuts at all levels. Approximately 170,000 Greater Toronto area Jews rely on a communal infrastructure built for 100,000.

Three quarters of the $100 million designated for the Endowment Fund will be set aside for unrestricted use, permitting UJA Federation to act quickly when a crisis arises. The remainder will be for restricted use attached to programs defined by the donor in consultation with UJA Federation. Contributors will be offered many avenues for giving cash gifts, gifts-in-kind, bequests, Perpetual Annual Campaign Endowments (P.A.C.E.) and life insurance policies.

Paul Morton

The $50 million Capital Fund will be put toward a variety of uses involving physical facilities and innovative projects.

"Now more than ever, the viability of the existing infrastructure and the development of the necessary new facilities, services and programs depend on new funding initiatives from the Jewish community," says outgoing UJA Federation President Sandra Brown.

Leaders of the Legacy Campaign pin their hopes for success on a donor centred approach emphasizing the community benefits and personal financial advantages of endowment giving. Campaign Chair Barry Sherman is a long-time believer in endowments and will play an active role in spreading the message to potential contributors.

"The essence of the message is two-fold," explains Sherman. "First, the community needs endowments. Second, it makes sense for donors to give them."

"The community cannot afford to take the risk," says Paul Morton, who chairs UJA Federation's Board of Endowment Trustees . "We must protect our future and ensure that our wonderful existing services continue for the next generation and the one after that."

Shermans head $150 million initiative

Honey and Barry Sherman have been generous supporters of UJA Federation for many years, contributing leading gifts to the annual and special campaigns. As they embark on their latest philanthropic pursuit, heading UJA Federation's $150 million Legacy campaign, the Shermans say their charitable efforts are nothing more than natural instinct.

"I derive great personal satisfaction from acting upon the natural human desire to help others," says Barry, CEO of Apotex Inc, Canada's largest generic drug manufacturer. "My good fortune affords me the opportunity to strive for an extra measure of happiness by helping others whether it be family, friends, members of our community, our country or mankind at large."

Barry began his climb to the top of Canada's pharmaceutical industry after graduating from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology with a Ph.D in astronautics. Sherman, along with a partner, bought Empire Laboratories from his uncle in 1967 and sold the company in 1974. The proceeds from the sale of Empire were used to create Apotex.

Immediately after Apotex opened for business, Sherman set up a charitable foundation which annually received 20% of corporate and personal earnings for charitable giving. The success of Apotex and the growth of the Foundation have led to several sizeable donations to UJA Federation, Mount Sinai Hospital, the University of Toronto, the Baycrest Centre and the United Way.

Honey, a member of the Legacy Steering Committee and Fundraising Cabinet, stresses the importance of passing on Jewish values from one generation to another and developing resources to reach out to more community members. "If we don't do something now to respond to current and future needs, there will be no one left to worry about later," she explains. "I'm just grateful that Barry and I can share our good fortune."

Both point out how far behind Canadian Jewish communities are in securing the future through endowments and long-term gifts compared to U.S. campaigns. "The big gifts of yesterday can no longer guarantee that what we have today will exist tomorrow," Barry says. "Endowment giving makes more sense. It is both cost effective and better for the community."

Capital Fund for community infrastructure

UJA Federation's Legacy Campaign Capital Fund will not only improve our current communal infrastructure, it will also provide families with opportunities to enhance the pleasure of giving.

The $50 million Capital Fund will raise money specifically for physical structures and human services programs. Capital Fund contributors will be able to direct their dollars according to their own preferences, based on community priorities. Donors may also choose to link their family's name to a community building.

A top priority is a new campus for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto which could accommodate 1,000 students. The existing Wilmington campus can no longer adequately house a student population that has grown from 550 to 750 in the last four years. CHAT President Norman Grill cites a high level of student retention and growing enrollment for the increased demand.

"We have a tremendous need for a new school located along the Bathurst Street corridor," Grill stresses. "Right next door to the Bathurst Jewish Centre would be an ideal site because it would be an equal distance for our students travelling north and south to get to school."

Other projects are a York Region campus for community services, a youth dormitory in Jerusalem for Israel Experience participants and school computer labs.

Former UJA Federation Campaign Chair Chuck Gold is excited about the prospects of families making decisions together about which projects they want to support. "The process of including the entire family will bring the younger generation into the community and provide them with a real sense of communal ownership."

MISSION SEFARADE PILGRIMAGE TO THE PAST

A UJA Federation delegation has recently returned from the first mission to Morocco and Israel.

The twelve day Mission Sefarade began with a tour of Morocco's Jewish communities in Fes, Marrakech and Casablanca, followed by visits to schools, youth centres and projects sponsored by the Joint Distribution Committee, supported, in part, by UJA Federation. Other sites included a home for the elderly, the Oeuvre Secours aux Enfants medical facility, ancient synagogues and other historic locations.

Since the end of World War II, Morocco's Jewish population has dwindled from 300,000 to 5,000 with the largest number of Jews, mostly elder, living in and around Casablanca.

"I was very impressed with the students we met and how Jewish life survives thanks to help from UJA Federation funded agencies and individual determination," notes Myra Mechanic. "The whole trip was an eye opening experience."

Myra's husband, Nathan, was most intrigued by a visit to Morocco's southern Atlas Mountains where, until 75 years ago, Berber Jews lived as their ancient ancestors did more than 2000 years before, after the destruction of the second Temple. "I never realized how ancient our roots are. It was absolutely fascinating."

Meeting Canada's ambassador to Morocco at a reception in Casablanca, and coming face to face with a 75 year man who was the last Jew to leave his village, were other highlights for the Mechanics. "The entire trip was first class."

"I was very moved to see the existence of Jewish life under such precarious conditions," recalls Ruth Van Messel, who was accompanied by her husband Ies. "But it was also sad to learn how many young Jews want to leave for France or Israel."

In Israel, mission participants were briefed by Jerusalem Report Managing Editor David Horovitz and Israeli businessman Dany Halperin, who spoke about Israel's economy. They also visited the Yad Vashem Children's Memorial, Yitzhak Rabin's gravesite and UJA Federation Project Renewal and Partnership 3000 communities.

The itinerary's social component was highlighted by a Hillula commemorating the anniversary of Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai's death in Ouazzane and a Yemenite wedding in Jerusalem. "Being a part of a family simcha in a real community was very special for us," said Myra Mechanic.

Writers honored at book awards

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Voices long silent have come to life in a resurgence of Jewish literature, 250 people attending the ninth annual Jewish Book Awards at Leah Posluns Theatre were told recently.

"We [Jews] are different. It's okay to write about it now,' said Dorothy Shoichet, Koffler Centre of the Arts president, in presenting Manny Drukier with an award for his Holocaust memoir, Carved in Stone.

"It's something for me to come home again," she said. "A lot of my life has been devoted to playing a non-Jew as an actor. It's time for me to express myself as a Jewish woman. We are finding that our Jewish voices are not hidden in the ghetto."

The same theme was taken up by Felicia Carmelly, who won the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem award for Holocaust history for Shattered: 50 Years of Silence.

"Until 1994, I didn't acknowledge that I was a Holocaust survivor," she said. "Then memories erupted and almost shattered me. But the book [about Transnistria and the killing of Romanian Jews] had to be done. There were 850,000 Jews in Romania and today there are 9,000. In a few years there will be no Jews in Romania."

Fugitive Pieces by Anne Michaels, which won the Martin and Beatrice Fischer prize for fiction, has been translated into 14 languages and published in 20 countries.

Renewing Our Days, a book about Montreal by Mervin Butovsky and Ira Robinson, was described by presenter Miriam Berke as a "must read" for Montrealers and transplanted Montrealers.

"Simcha is an unusual figure on the Canadian literary scene because he writes in three languages, Yiddish, Hebrew and English," Langer said

Other winners were Carol Matas of Winnipeg for After the War, Yves Lavertu of Montreal for The Bernonville Affair, Fraidie Martz for Open Your Hearts, Rabbi Steven Saltzman, for A Small Glimmer of Light, Roger Nash of Sudbury for In the Kosher Chow Mein Restaurant and Seymour Mayne and R. Glen Rotchin, editor of the poetry volume Jerusalem.

A total of $5,000 in prizes was distributed to the winners, said Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg, Book Awards Committee chair. At its first awards night nine years ago, only $500 was available.

Hannah Schulsheim-Beigel, a committee member, was chair of the evening. The awards were sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, with additional funding from the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of UJA Federation.

ASSOCIATED WITH 100 YEARS OF ZIONISM

With the help of their teachers, Mrs. Sommer and Mrs. Sela, students at the Hurwich branch of Associated Hebrew Day Schools have created a number of displays on 100 Years of Zionism. Four students are standing in front of the project that deals with some of Zionism's key religious figures.

Frankenberg elected new president of JNF

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Considering her interest in education and Zionism, being elected national president of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) was highly appropriate for Naomi Frankenberg.

"The Jewish National Fund is one of the truly leading Zionist organizations in this country and certainly around the world," said Frankenberg, 71, who will serve a three-year term as president.

"It's certainly a tremendous honor to be elected to this."

Frankenberg was elected last month at an annual JNF meeting in Vancouver. She takes over from Sid Halpern of Winnipeg.

Frankenberg is the first Vancouverite and only the second woman to be elected to the position. She is a past national president of Hadassah-WIZO and is currently president of Maimonides Secondary School. She has also worked with numerous organizations in the Vancouver area. "Education and Zionism are my two major concerns," she said.

The mandate of the JNF is to raise money to be put into projects in Israel, primarily for soil and water reclamation, but also for building services such as plumbing in new settlements.

The 96-year-old organization is perhaps best known for the little blue boxes it has used for decades collect money and for its numerous tree-planting projects in Israel. To date, the JNF has planted over 200 million trees in Israel, Frankenberg said, adding that Canada has the highest per capita contribution rate of all the countries that contribute to the international fundraising organization.

The latest project in which the JNF is involved, and for which Frankenberg will help raise funds working closely with other countries, is called Action Plan Negev.

"[We're] really trying to do what [David] Ben-Gurion told us, which is one of the most important things in Israel, namely to make the desert bloom," said Frankenberg.

JNF-supported projects are also meant to provide employment for Israelis, as well as to take the pressure off the country's urban centres, which are straining under the influx of new immigrants.

"The population is growing more and more rapidly," said Frankenberg. "It's becoming urgent that we develop the Negev and make it a place where people want to go and live.

"It's an enormous task — planting trees, digging reservoirs, working in agriculture, and the money sent from the JNF around the world is actually to pay the salaries of the workers, who are mostly new immigrants and very poor."

Other officers elected at the meeting were Gary Averbach as chair of policy and planning, Norman Gold as chair of subscriptions and Ruth Freeman as an executive officer. Bill Gruenthal, who is the regional president of the JNF in the Pacific region, was elected to the JNF board of directors.

Vancouver Walk with Israel raises $4,500

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The 11th annual Walk with Israel attracted almost 500 participants and raised $4,500, despite overcast skies.

The funds, said Tracey Ames, executive director of the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), "will be used for scholarships for youth trips to Israel."

In addition, Ames said, the CZF, which sponsors the walk, organizes the event "in order to have a community awareness day to bring the Vancouver Jewish community together to celebrate Israel.

"The date of the walk always coincides with Yom Yerushalayim, which commemorates the day in 1967 when Jerusalem was recaptured by Israeli forces.

"This year is a very special year," she added "because it marks 30 years of the reunification of Jerusalem and it also marks 100 years of Zionism."

At the opening ceremonies for this year's walk, several local Jewish school choirs performed before Geoffrey Druker, president of the CZF's Pacific region, officially kicked off the ceremonies with an opening address. He then presented departing Rabbi Wilfred Soloman of Congregation Beth Israel and his wife Phyllis with the annual Jerusalem prize for their years of devoted service to the community.

After the presentation, Rabbi Ross Singer of Congregation Shaarey Tefilah recited the prayer for Jerusalem and then, as he had done in previous years, Rabbi Soloman marked the beginning of the walk by blowing the shofar.

After the walk, the festivities continued in the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) parking lot, where walkers munched on cotton candy and popcorn and sampled kosher food supplied by Ominitsky's and Sabra's. A clown roamed the grounds while Hebrew and Yiddish music played in the background courtesy of HaMakor radio and Seacoast Sound.

A highlight of the afternoon was a performance by the local band, Klezmer Mombassea, who kept the audience entertained with an eclectic and energetic set that included original songs dedicated to the JCC and Hillel House. Their rendition of Havah Nagilah had the audience doing the horah in the parking lot.

Two Jewish B.C. women honored

By BAILA LAZARUS
Western Jewish Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Two local Jewish women received pleasant shocks last month when they were announced as winners in the YWCA Women of Distinction Awards Program.

The award recognizes women who have contributed to their community through their career or volunteer work.

Dr. Beverly Spring was chosen out of eight women in the Health and Wellness category for her work as a consultant physician in palliative care. Rita Akselrod won in the Voluntary Community and Humanitarian Service category from among 13 other women, the most nominated in any of the 10 categories. She was recognized for her work with Mothers Against Drunk Drivers (MADD) and with the Holocaust Education Centre.

"After seeing so many high profile people in my category I didn't think for one moment that I would win," said Akselrod, 66.

Spring, 47, a family physician for 20 years, decided to specialize in palliative care five years ago, after spending time with some terminally ill patients.

Palliative care is the caring for the terminally ill when curing and prolonging life are no longer the main focus and the emphasis has shifted to the patient's comfort and quality of life. Often specialized care is needed.

Spring thinks the award is a statement about the shift toward recognizing people who work in fields which have gotten little exposure. "Death and dying is finally out of the closet and being talked about," said Spring, formerly of Toronto.

Akselrod co-founded Mothers Against Drunk Drivers after her 24-year-old daughter was killed by a drunk driver 16 years ago. A child survivor of the Holocaust, she was a founding member of the Vancouver Holocaust Centre Society, is an active board member and chairs their outreach committee. She also facilitates a grief support group through the Jewish Family Service Agency and volunteers at the Louis Brier Home for the elderly.

Though Akselrod has spent many years dedicating her time to worthy causes, she never thought she would win the award. She was happy just to be nominated.

"When I was nominated by my colleagues at the Holocaust Centre Society, I felt so proud." said Akselrod. "I had such a wonderful feeling of accomplishment because of my colleagues, because of my friends who believed in me and felt I was worthy of this gift, of this honor. I thought I was a winner already."

By ROBERTA STALEY
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Columnist Doug Collins took centre stage at the midpoint of a British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal hearing into whether he exposed Jews to hatred.

With as much vigor and vitriol as he dishes up in his bi-weekly diatribes, Collins defended his "Hollywood propaganda" column which ran March 9, 1994 in the North Shore News.

"There is not a word of hatred in that column that any one can identify. It's simply a matter that they don't like the content of the column as such," Collins told the hearing May 28.

"I might add that there will never be an apology. As far as I'm concerned, they can hang me up by my heels and they won't get an apology," he said, sparking applause from many of the 100 spectators.

The hearing is looking into a complaint by Canadian Jewish Congress that 76-year-old Collins contravened Section 2 of the B.C. Human Rights Code. The code prohibits the public expression of hate messages likely to expose a person or group to hatred or contempt.

The tribunal is also hearing arguments about whether Section 2 goes against the Charter of Rights and Freedom's guarantee of free speech.

Collins also took a swipe at the provincial government's human rights code. Victoria changed B.C.'s human rights code in 1993 to allow tribunals to impose unlimited fines on those making statements deemed to expose individuals or groups to hatred or contempt.

"The regulation of speech... amounts to government thought control," said Collins.

Congress lawyer Gregory Walsh argued at the hearing that the laws of defamation that give an individual remedy if their reputation or integrity has been impugned should also apply to groups. Collins admitted under cross-examination that there is no way to for groups to address perceived wrongs except at a human rights hearing.

Spectators, some supporting Congress and others backing Collins, maintained cold and silent distances between each other. As the Bulletin conducted interviews with spectators during a break in proceedings, North shore resident Ilana Mercer interrupted.

"Why are you talking to those people?" Mercer snapped. "Why don't you talk to Jews?"

And a supporter of Doug Collins refused to give his name because he feared the Bulletin would "defame him." The man admitted he hadn't read any of the Bulletin's coverage of the hearing.

Earlier last week, internationally respected Calgary law professor Kathleen Mahoney testified in support of anti-hate legislation.

"Hate speech is a practice of discrimination," said Mahoney, whose qualifications include counsel and advocate from 1993 to the present in the International Court of Justice for Bosnia and Herzegovina in Application of the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide.

She said anti-hate legislation is necessary to combat the expansion of extreme right-wing movements which have sprung up since the end of the Cold War.

An increase in anti-Semitic and anti-gay activities has been documented since 1992 in the United States, Mahoney said. Incidents have included cemetery desecrations, arsons and bombings.

She said British Columbia isn't immune to bigotry. "B.C. is the place where some of the worst racist [incidents] have taken place."

Radler condemns Congress

By ROBERTA STALEY
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Southam Inc. executive David Radler has slammed Canadian Jewish Congress for turning North Shore News columnist Doug Collins into what he calls a martyr.

"Canadian Jewish Congress is really more responsible for the creation of what I would call the Collins phenomenon," said Radler, deputy chair and associate CEO of Southam Inc., which owns 62 percent of the North Shore News. Radler is also president and chief operating officer of Hollinger Inc., which controls Southam. Hollinger's chair is newspaper tycoon Conrad Black.

"[Congress] went out and decided to send him to martyrdom. They just went ahead, barrelled ahead as they so often do," said Radler, who spoke to the Bulletin from the Chicago Sun-Times office where he is publisher, chair and CEO.

"The way for this community to deal with people that they don't like in newspapers is to stop supporting those advertisers that are supporting that newspaper," he added.

The B.C. Human Rights Tribunal is holding a five-week hearing into a Congress complaint that Collins contravened Section 2 of the B.C. Human Rights Code. The code prohibits the public expression of hate messages likely to expose a person or group to hatred or contempt.

The complaint was filed in response to a March 9, 1994, North Shore News column by Collins titled Hollywood Propaganda, which referred to the movie Schindler's List as part of the Hollywood propaganda machine. He also disputed the figure of six million Jews killed during World War II.

Radler pointed an accusing finger at Congress while being questioned on why Southam, which has editorial control over such dailies as the Vancouver Sun and Province, couldn't exert more influence over the North Shore News.

Southam owns 62 percent of Lower Mainland Publishing Ltd., which owns the North Shore News, one in a chain of 27 newspapers in British Columbia and Washington State.

Madison Venture Corp. owns the other 38 percent. Tiny percentages are owned by other individuals, including North Shore News publisher Peter Speck.

Madison, which manages the paper, holds a voting share majority at 51 percent compared to Southam's 49 percent. With Madison holding the majority voting share, Southam cannot influence editorial policy at the paper, said Radler.

"That looks like I'm hiding," he admitted.

Rick O'Connor, vice-president of newspapers for Lower Mainland Publishing, said his company must also maintain a hands-off editorial policy because of an ongoing, seven-year battle with the federal Industry Department's competition bureau. The bureau has challenged Southam's investment in Lower Mainland Publishing over concerns of monopoly newspaper ownership.

The result has forced Madison and Southam to acquiesce all editorial control to Speck, said O'Connor.

Radler, said he would fire Collins if Southam did control the North Shore News.

However, he still supported the right-wing columnist's right to his opinion. "There are a lot of people like me who do feel strongly that people have the right to say what they want. [But] the guy should be on a soapbox on some street corner."

He said the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal hearing is setting a dangerous precedent.

The Kaballah of Volunteering

by Rabbi Michael Skobac
Jewish Campus Services

During the 20th century, North American Jews have established communal and social service structures of stellar quality that are admired and held up as exemplary far and wide. Over the past decade, the burning issue of Jewish continuity has driven many people to wonder if the culture of philanthropy we've built will be able to sustain itself. Today's world has shown a thirst for meaning and spirituality – can our communal and Tzedaka activities nourish hungry Jewish souls?

The passion to "seek" often leads people to esoteric studies, retreats and travel to exotic places. Judaism has always known that true spirituality lies much closer to home. Our mystical tradition reveals the potential for spirituality in seemingly mundane activities. It depends on your perspective. The most primal religious impulse is the striving to cleave to the Almighty. Our Torah teaches that to get close to G-d, we need to pattern our lives after G-d, to be as G-d.

> "Just as He clothes the naked (Adam and Eve), so you shall also clothe the naked. G-d visited the sick (Abraham), you shall also visit the sick. As He comforted mourners (Isaac), so you shall comfort mourners. Just as He buried the dead (Moses), so shall you bury the dead"

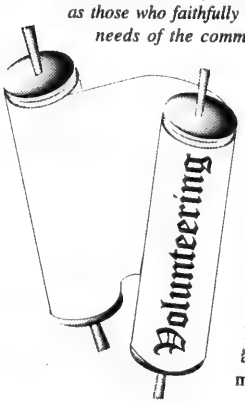
All too often, we aren't sensitive to the holiness of giving, helping and going beyond ourselves. We also miss the author of the Grand Canyon, snowflakes and blue jays.

The nobility of voluntarism is acknowledged in our Shabbat morning liturgy. After the Torah reading, there is a special blessing for "...those who give Tzedaka to the poor, as well as those who faithfully occupy themselves with the needs of the community." Rabbi Yosef Karo notes in his Beit Yosef that by publicly proclaiming the great reward that awaits those who serve the community, we hope that others will emulate their deeds. We learn in Ethics of the Fathers (1:2) that ultimately the universe is sustained by the unselfish giving that we do. Let's keep up the good work, and appreciate what it really means. ■



From the Desk of Sandra Brown...

I have always believed that voluntarism is an essential expression of "tzedaka." As my term as President of UJA Federation comes to a close, I am now able to more fully appreciate how generous our community truly is.

Over the past two years, I have witnessed members of our Jewish community, from all walks of life, step up to take responsibility, to lend a hand, to offer their time, wisdom and compassion in order to support individuals in need and to continue to help build our community services.

Your commitment to our agencies, synagogues, schools and organizations, manifested through your volunteer service, stands as a legacy that we are continually challenged to emulate.

I am grateful to each and every one of you for what you have accomplished - and for what together, we will accomplish in the future.

Sincerely,

Sandra Brown

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto

UJA FEDERATION

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is delighted once again to recognize volunteers from a broad spectrum of organizations across our community.

Encouraging collective responsibility and supporting activities which are of communal benefit has long been a tradition in our community. The men and women pictured in the following pages represent the finest within our Jewish community who are continuing that tradition. The commitment of these dedicated volunteers to their organizations and to the welfare of their brethren ensures the continuity of our community and its institutions while, at the same time, providing a much needed service.

And so - to these dedicated volunteers, we say "Thank You." Thank you for your leadership and your compassion. Thank you for your endless willingness to get involved. As a community we all take pride in your contributions and accomplishments. As individuals, we are all inspired by your timeless efforts and sense of Tzedaka.

Volunteer Excellence: The Community Honours Its Own

The women and men pictured here have made tzedaka and community involvement constant priorities in their lives. Their unrelenting commitment to Jewish values and to preserving human dignity improve the lives of so many and instill enormous community pride in us all. Earlier this week, at UJA Federation's Annual Meeting, these special community members were presented with volunteer recognition awards on behalf of the entire community.

Koschitzkys Named Sadowski Award Winners

"They say you make a living by what you do, but you make a life by what you share, and sharing our lives with our community, with Jews around the world, and with our extended families in Israel, has been a life's experience. When we reflect on what we have gained personally, what we have learned and how we have been enriched, we know that all our time and effort has been and will continue to be worthwhile."

David Engel Receives Granovsky Award

UJA Federation's highly respected David Engel has been chosen as the first recipient of the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence.

"Volunteering is a responsibility and a privilege. I am a firm believer that the benefits far outweigh the efforts. When my wife Judy and I came to Toronto, we wanted to make a secure home for our children, and the way we did that was by volunteering in the community."

Leadership Development Award Winners

Leadership Development Awards were established to encourage young men and women to assume community leadership roles. They are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

Dov Altman

"I was taught by my parents that all people should be treated with respect and dignity, and if someone needs help, you give as much as you can. Volunteering in the community gives me a sense of fulfilment and allows me to accomplish that objective."

Eileen Silver

"Volunteering for me is a natural 'do good - feel good' combination. It has helped me grow personally. It has allowed me the opportunity to work with dedicated lay people and professionals and, at the same time, it has given me the gratification of seeing how my efforts have benefitted the community."

Shem Tov Award Recipients

The Shem Tov Awards are presented to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto's Jewish community.

Marlene Axmith

UJA Federation Women's Campaign

"In Hebrew, the root of the word for giving is spelled identically frontwards and backwards. Whatever is given is also received. My volunteer experience has proven this to be true. Whatever I have given to the community has come back to me enriched and continues to enrich my life."

Michael Bowman

Jewish Family & Child Service

"My parents taught me that it is better to give than to receive. Volunteering for JF&CS has provided me with an opportunity to give and to be of service to our community, and to contribute towards and advocate on behalf of a worthy organization and cause. Both my wife and I have been active volunteers in the Jewish community and we hope that our children will follow our example."

Ronald Hoffman

Reena Foundation

"Hillel said it best. 'If I am only for me, what am I?' Voluntarism is an opportunity to do what is right and just for the needy, our community and ourselves."

Yvonne Martell

Bernard Betel Centre

"I like to think that my role, however small, helps make a difference. It is a privilege to contribute to the Toronto Jewish community, to be associated with worthwhile causes, and to work alongside other volunteers and dedicated staff."

Peter Shenfield

Jewish Vocational Services

"When I moved to Toronto, part of my reason for getting involved was to network and to 'get to know' my new community. Twelve years and many positions later, the learning experiences, and the opportunity to work with some incredible people has been fabulous. As an added bonus, I met my future wife, who is also a volunteer, through my involvement with JVS."

Morley Wolfe, Q.C.

Jewish Camp Council

"I have always believed in the ethic of Voluntarism: the giving of oneself without compulsion or expectation of reward, for the betterment of one's community. To help fulfil the needs of our society and to ease its burdens brings its own compensation - just do it!"

Volunteers Who Make A Difference! In Our Community

Our volunteers play a key role in providing assistance to our community. They are an integral component in the successful functioning of many of the agencies, congregations, schools and institutions available to us.

We are pleased to pay tribute to those dedicated men and women who represent the spirit of voluntarism across the broad spectrum of our Jewish community. Their personal expressions of commitment have indeed made a difference. Meet those volunteers who have been chosen by their organizations for their exceptional contributions to our Jewish community.

New Volunteer Initiative Meets Changing Needs

Like everything else in life, the nature of voluntarism changes to reflect the needs, styles and interests of volunteers and those who benefit from their service.

To address these changes, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto continually seeks out new and creative ways to connect volunteers to agencies and individuals who require their time and attention. These efforts reflect the fundamental ethical basis of our community: to reach out and involve members of our community in its effort of "tikkun olam - to make the world better."

Our new approach to voluntarism now under study is "Jewish Toronto Cares." JTC is being designed to provide different and rewarding opportunities for volunteers, while expanding the scope of service provided to agencies and their clients. This volunteer effort may not necessarily be restricted to Jewish community needs, but may be extended to the larger community to which we also belong.

Its intent is to provide teams of young people with opportunities to fulfill their ethical and human commitments without having to sit on traditional types of volunteer committees. Recognizing that young people may not have the time to devote to long-term commitments, JTC will provide young volunteers with opportunities to perform activities on a "one-shot-only" basis.

Volunteer opportunities such as driving someone to a doctor's office, painting a fence, distributing flyers, and ushering at a performance will be gathered from community organizations and posted on an office hotline, or on the Jewish Toronto web site. With coordination from UJA Federation's Department for Human Resources Development, JTC has the potential to involve a whole new population of volunteers with a message of compassion and caring for all.

"This approach will allow us the opportunity to create new volunteer opportunities and offer them to people who might otherwise miss out on their chance to help others and build the community at the same time," notes Helen Finder-Guttman, Human Resources Vice-President.

For more information about "Jewish Toronto Cares," call UJA Federation's Department for Human Resources Development at (416) 635-2883 ext. 137. ■

LD Program: Building a Community of Leaders

Our Toronto Jewish community serves as a model of organization and leadership for Jewish communities around the world. They admire the vibrancy of our Jewish life, the competency of our human service organizations, and the quality of our schools. These communities are learning what our community already knows - that the dedication, insight and talent of thousands of volunteers make it happen.

Some people believe that leadership skills are inherent qualities of birth. Others believe that leadership skills are something you acquire with experience. In either case, everyone agrees that leadership skills can improve with proper training.

UJA Federation, through its Department for Human Resources Development, has offered a Leadership Development Program for many years. Although its content and format have gone through many changes, its purpose has remained the same: to prepare participants for policy level volunteer positions within UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its constituent agencies.

The challenge of setting policy and making decisions for a community as complex as ours is enormous. The ability of volunteer leaders to perform effectively requires an in-depth understanding of how communal policies are established, how non-profit agencies are governed, how needs of the community are prioritized, and how decisions are implemented.

Given the pluralistic nature of our community, the program seeks participants from diverse cultural, professional, religious and economic backgrounds. The program provides its participants with a leadership perspective based on knowledge and skill, as well as an awareness of the issues facing the community. And, after "graduation," the program provides policy level placements in our community agencies and organizations for every successful participant.

Since the program's inception, LD graduates have played key roles in the community. They have gone on to serve the community in senior capacities in every agency and school as well as in UJA Federation itself.

The success of the program speaks for itself. Take a look around the community and see who is filling the key leadership roles. Chances are, you will discover someone who is a graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program – an endeavour in which we can all take pride. ■

As well as interviewing, Marlene plays a vital role in following up with volunteers, ensuring that each person has been contacted and that at least one successful placement has resulted.

A prime example of a successful placement is Ittamar Janowski. Ittamar came through the volunteer interview process about a year ago. He was referred to the Zareinu Educational Centre, and was quickly matched up with a child. Through his very positive experiences, Ittamar's relationship with the Centre developed into a part-time position as an assistant teacher.

Marlene and Ittamar make a difference - and you can too! Join the many active volunteers in our community by calling our office at (416) 635-2883 ext. 137 to arrange an interview. ■

Lag b'Omer celebration unites Vancouver's Jewish community

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The city's first-ever communal Lag b'Omer celebration at Jericho Park West last month drew over 400 people.

The local Klezmer band Kreplach could be heard throughout the park, which overlooks the North Shore mountains. Other performers were the Beith Hamidrash children's choir and guitarist/singer Geoffrey Sachs.

Kosher hotdogs and hamburgers were sold, kites were flown and spirits soared.

Organized by RAV (the Rabbinical Association of Vancouver) in cooperation with Chabad, B'nai Brith Hillel, local synagogues (including the Burquest Jewish community) and the Western Jewish Bulletin, the event, which was coordinated by Ken Kaufman, the executive director of Hillel House and Ross Singer, the rabbi of Congregation Shaarey Tefilah, brought together Jews of all denominations from all over the city.

"Usually the community only comes together in times of tragedy," said Kaufman, who initiated the idea of staging a communal event on Lag b'Omer and convinced RAV to promote the event. "Today on Lag b'Omer, we wanted the community to come together to celebrate. And Lag b'Omer is the perfect time for us to celebrate together."

During the Omer, Kaufman explained, 24,000 students of Rabbi Akiva, the leading scholars of their generation, died from a plague. According to Kaufman, the Gemara says that the reason G-d allowed this to happen was that they didn't treat each other with respect. There was a pause in the plague on Lag b'Omer, he added, and it is therefore an appropriate day for Jews of different persuasions to come together and to treat each other with respect.

Anne Goldberg, executive director of the Schara Tzedek synagogue, which also helped make the celebration a reality, agrees with Kaufman and feels that the community is "too polarized [and] there should be more opportunities for the community to get together."

She said she hopes that this year's Lag b'Omer event "will be the first of many such events."

Okanagan Jewish community celebrates nine bnot mitzvah

KELOWNA — The Okanagan Jewish community's (OJC) Beth Shalom Santuary recently celebrated a bnot mitzvah with nine women being called to the Torah.

The following women were called and received honor for their accomplishment by the community, their friends and relatives: Olga Birney, Gloria Golbey, Shawna Kotler, Shelley Malkin, Anita Nadler, Alicia Ruby, Linda Ruby, Linda van Wilde Rode and Irmgard Tirschiler.

Guests travelled from across Canada and the United States to join the celebrants. The program, an idea initiated by Malkin, started approximately eight months ago. It was undertaken as a community project involving many members of the OJC, including Ron Gold, Evan Orloff, Steven Finkelman, Gloria Golbey, Donna Rubadeau and Murray Malkin.

Stephen Cipes, a member of the OJC, provided the wine for the barbecue which was attended by approximately 150 guests.

Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem

Rabbi Alexander S. Linchner ז"ל

Nofloh Ateres Roshaynu, the crown of our head has fallen. Oy lonu ki shokoh shimshosaynu, woe to us for our sun has set. Boys Town Jerusalem mourns with profound sorrow the passing of its esteemed, revered and beloved Rabbi Alexander Sender Linchner, zecher tzadik livrocho.

Rabbi Linchner was a visionary who devoted his every thought, action and moment to Toras Yisroel, Am Yisroel and Eretz Yisroel. Inspired and guided by his legendary father-in-law, Reb Shraga Feivel Mendlowitz, zt"l, founder of Torah U'Mesorah, and spiritual force behind virtually every major institution of Torah, Rabbi Linchner set out with a passionate commitment to teach and inspire Jewish youth, both here and in Israel.

As a young American yeshiva student, he went to pre-war Europe to study with the sainted Chofetz Chaim, whose love for the Jewish People would continue to inspire Rabbi Linchner throughout his life. He returned to the U.S. only to be devastated at the loss of six million Jews, particularly one and a half million innocent children. He was permanently affected by the Nazis' carefully orchestrated plan to bring about the spiritual demise of the Jewish People by systematically murdering the Roshei Yeshiva, rabbis and Torah scholars and destroying of all of Europe's Torah centers, cities, towns and shtetlach. He viewed himself as a Holocaust survivior, committing his life to restore the Jewish People to their glory — primarily through its youth — return Torah learning to its primacy and build the Land of Israel.

Profoundly influenced by Rabbi Shamshon Raphael Hirsch's philosophy of Torah im Derech Eretz, he founded Boys Town Jerusalem where he would teach students that they stood in the place of that lost generation of Jewish children and would inspire them to carry on with our timeless Torah heritage.

Rabbi Linchner nurtured Boys Town not just as a school, but as a movement. Its 5,000 graduates have taken the value system imbued in them to virtually every Israeli city, town and village which now bears indelible imprint of the sterling character and values of Rabbi Linchner and his revered and sainted mentors, the G'doley Yisroel. Most important, he touched the lives of countless Israeli youth, giving them hope, opportunity and the means to lead a self-respecting life as they collectively built the Land of Israel while molding its spiritual fibre. The Jewish People have suffered an irreplaceable loss.

Our ultimate tribute to Rabbi Linchner — who never compromised principle, by remaining steadfast to the Torah — will be through our rededication to the tangible expression of his lifelong mission of perpetuating the timeless values of Torah in Eretz Yisroel, Boys Town Jerusalem. Boruch attoh b'voecho, u'voruch attoh b'tzaysecho.

We express our heartfelt sympathy to Rebbetzin Linchner, Rabbi Moshe Linchner, Mrs. Naomi Rothstein, his children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and his cherished extended family, the Boys Town Jerusalem mishpocho. Hamakom yinachem eschem besoch shaar a'velay Tzion v'Yerushalayim.

Jewish professor at McMaster teaches New Testament studies

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — "What's a nice Jewish girl doing in New Testament studies?"

At the most recent in the Ben Meyer Lecture Series at the JCC, McMaster religious studies Prof. Adele Reinhartz said she had been asked that particular question on a number of occasions.

In her lecture, Reinhartz recalled that the original topic of her doctorate from the department of religion at McMaster was Rabbinic Judaism's Portrayal of Abraham. Her interest in New Testament studies developed gradually as her exposure to advanced level courses in Greek and early Christianity revealed similarities between early Christianity and first-century Judaism.

In time, she came to feel that the idea of a Jewish professor of Christianity might have a significant impact on Christian students. In the early days of her career as a professor of New Testament studies, she had determined to convey to her students that the often negative portrayal of Jews in much of the Christian Bible was a result of the specific context of the period, namely the rivalry that existed at the time between the followers of Jesus and the Jewish establishment. Citing several passages that refer to Jewish practice, she explained how she uses these occasions to elaborate on Jewish customs.

She also presented a number of passages that portray Jews in a particularly negative light, admitting that for many years the reading of the Book of Matthew "chilled me to the bone."

Her presentation of some of these passages with their graphic demonization of Jews had a similar effect on the audience that evening, as it became increasingly evident that the unquestioning reader of these texts could easily reach the conclusion that Jews and Judaism were anathema to Christians.

Reinhartz admitted that current anti-Semitic rhetoric still uses the Christian Bible as a source to justify its accusations. But she ended by making a plea for religious tolerance and pluralism.

"Following one path in belief or practice does not require invalidation of other paths or the denigration of those who choose them."

Jewish school leased to Christian academy

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It will be the end of an era on June 30, when the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE) closes its 45-year-old north Winnipeg day school and transfers the operations to the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

In lieu of a buyer, Jewish Community Campus Corp. has leased the complex — which included the JK to Grade 6 Talmud Torah-I.L. Peretz Folk School, the Grade 7 to 12 Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and the Talmud Torah-Beth Jacob Synagogue — to Faith Academy, a private Christian school.

This is the second north Winnipeg Jewish school that Faith Academy has taken over. Five years ago, the academy bought the old Peretz School building, which the BJE had vacated a few years earlier. With enrolment growing, Faith Academy needed a larger building. They are leasing the Talmud Torah/Joseph Wolinsky Complex with an option to buy.

A sore point among some people is that the synagogue members are to be out by June 30 and that the synagogue is going to be converted into a church. The synagogue membership's case is weakened however by the fact that the synagogue was always a part of the school rather than being an independent entity and for many years no membership dues were collected.

Campus Corp. gave the synagogue membership the opportunity to match any offers that came in for the building, and during the winter, some of the members and a group of parents tried unsuccessfully to raise money in the community to buy the building and start an independent north Winnipeg Jewish elementary school.

The synagogue membership at this point is still not sure what they are going to do. They are hoping to relocate to another as yet undetermined location nearby. Thus far, they are not considering amalgamation with any of the other small Orthodox congregations in the north end.

Cairo negotiations fail to produce results

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Despite a last-minute squabble that nearly threw them off track, Israeli and Palestinian officials met under Egyptian auspices for nearly three hours in Cairo in an effort to talk their way back to the negotiating table.

However, their failure to issue a joint communique or to provide details of the three-sided discussion suggested they were unsuccessful.

Israel's four-man team had been told their trip to Egypt was about to be canceled, when the Palestinian side admitted that there were no prior Israeli commitments to stop settlement building and suspend the Har Choma housing project, thereby removing the obstacle.

The team members were cabinet secretary Danny Naveh, Foreign Ministry aide Yaacov Bardugo, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's political adviser Uzi Arad and attorney Yitzhak Molcho, a Netanyahu confidant.

The talks were beneficial, said Netanyahu spokesperson Shai Bazak. There still is a need for more work by the parties in order to bridge the gaps, and therefore it was agreed that the work will continue in the days ahead.

Before the talks could begin, there were two tense hours during which the Israeli negotiators waited for the PA to disavow claims about a settlement halt by its spokesperson, Marwan Kanafani, a longtime confidant of Chairman Yasser Arafat.

When Erekat announced that Israel had not agreed to anything in advance, thereby providing the substantive retraction demanded by Bazak, the diplomatic drama came to a quick denouement.

Until then, pessimism prevailed in the Prime Ministers Office, with director of communications David Bar-Illan saying the outcome was predictable and would amount to nothing.

But the mood in Palestinian political circles remained upbeat throughout.

Arafat adviser Nabil Abu-Rudeina said the Palestinian delegation hoped to terminate the crisis in the light of the Egyptian efforts to advance the peace process. The unusual optimism stemmed from a comment, attributed to European Community peace envoy Miguel Moratinos, that Netanyahu had agreed to freeze construction work at Har Choma.

Arafat flew to Amman to confer with King Hussein about the potential breakthrough.

As if to prove that the concessions attributed to Netanyahu were politically impossible due to the makeup of his coalition, Aharon Domb, secretary-general of the Council of Settlements in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, charged that the council had reason to believe the government circulated reports about a compromise ,which he described as having no basis in reality.

Domb said there was no stoppage of any kind in the work under way in the settlements of Judea and Samaria.

In related developments the Likud faction is scheduled to meet with Netanyahu to discuss diplomatic developments. Likud faction chair Michael Eitan said the prime minister had informed him that the process of forming Israel's stand on the negotiations is not yet finished and he is interested in hearing the opinion of the Likud MKs.

Eitan said there are legitimate differences of opinion within the party on the extent of concessions, but the whole coalition is united in its belief that were the negotiations being carried out today by a left-wing government, the scope of the comprehensive concessions it would make would endanger national security.

National Religious Party faction head Hanan Porat demanded that the delegation first of all raise the subject of the land dealers killed for selling land to Jews.

Barak takes on new role

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor party chair Ehud Barak decided to assign himself the authority of the party secretary-general for the coming four months. In that period, he will decide whether to call elections for a new secretary-general or to appoint an administrative director-general, as Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu did when he took over the Likud in 1993.

Barak spent Sunday at party headquarters in Tel Aviv. He also met with his party rivals and his predecessor, Shimon Peres.

Barak arrived at headquarters and was welcomed with flowers, snacks, and wine. He raised a toast to the Netanyahu government's quick demise.

Soon after occupying Peres' chair, he met with outgoing secretary-general Nissim Zvilli and party law committee head David Libai. At the end of the meeting, it was announced that when Zvillis' resignation takes effect, Barak will stand in for him for four months.

Barak is encountering both opposition and support for his possible plans to appoint a director-general. MK Haggai Merom hotly opposes doing away with the secretary-generalship, a post for which many in the party say he plans to run. Merom says that discontinuing the post means downgrading the party and placing all the power in the chair's hands, as happened in the Likud.

Before he made his ceremonial appearance at party headquarters, Barak began his round of meetings with his rivals in his Ramat Gan office suite. There is a possibility that he will continue to operate out of the suite.

The first to appear was Ramon, whom Barak considers his potentially most troublesome opponent because he has threatened to challenge him in 1999 and because he can potentially leave Labor and opt for a new party.

The meeting was mainly a photo opportunity, with both men emerging all smiles but admitting that nothing of substance was discussed.

We still have no political loot to divide, Barak explained, but added that "I see in Haim a very important person in helping bring down the Netanyahu government. I am sure that he will lend his shoulder to the task and that we will work in harmony."

Ramon said that "all the hard feelings which have existed between us are minor in comparison to what happened in Labor in the past. The days of the Rabin-Peres feud will not come back. I think that feud was largely responsible for our failure to win back power. The differences between us are not deep. They are the sort that often crop up in politics."

Barak's meeting with MK Yossi Beilin, who won nearly 29 percent of the primary votes, was also a photo opportunity. "Yossi is a central figure in the party," Barak said. "I see him as a very important factor, and together we will lead the party to success."

Beilin obliged by seeming to back away from his earlier demands for the No. 2 slot. "Numbers are for the health fund clinic. I don't believe in numbers and will not come to Ehud with numbers."

Discordant sounds, however, came from the party's rising star, Shlomo Ben-Ami, who had insisted that he does not want to be artificially limited to the socio-economic rubric. "I will not be categorized because of my ethnic background. I will set the balance between the issues I choose to deal with."

Ephraim Sneh spoke against factionalism, but indicated that "I will stay true to my political following and this group will continue to back me. A party need not be monolithic."

Syria concerned over Turkish move into Iraq

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Regional affairs experts here attributed Syria's declared interest in resuming negotiations with Israel to Damascus' concern about the Turkish army's incursion into northern Iraq.

Turkey's objective is to clear the region of Kurdish separatist guerrillas affiliated with the PKK, whose leader, Abdullah Ocalan, is believed to have enjoyed Syrian hospitality.

Yossi Olmert, a former member of the Israeli delegation to the peace talks with Syria, said the Syrians need tranquillity and stability along their southern border under these circumstances.

Olmert contended that President Hafez al-Assad already has introduced some radical shifts in his foreign policy: a furtive rapprochement with Iraq, in which he set aside long-standing ideological differences in favor of a united Arab front against a perceived threat from the Turks; and a revision of his overall strategic concept, as a result of which his readiness to cooperate with Baghdad may impair his bid for closer relations with the United States.

On the other hand, flexibility toward renewed negotiations with Israel could mollify Washington's displeasure at his uneasy relationship with Turkey and concurrent outreach to Iraq.

Syria is also concerned about Turkey's new military links with Israel, regarding them as a potential cause of subversion and a threat to security, Olmert said.

These considerations surfaced in the light of Vice-President Abdel Halim Khaddam's call on Israel's government to reconsider its policy to facilitate a practical dialogue. Khaddam's initiative was announced last week after talks with Lebanese President Elias Hrawi in Beirut.

Turkey's impatience with Syrian support of the PKK dates back more than a decade, when its late president Turgut Ozal paid an official visit to Damascus, only to discover that Ocalan's apartment was only a few blocks from his hotel.

Syria has denied Ocalan's presence on Syrian territory.

Despite the potential showdown with Turkey, Olmert doubted that Assad would turn his back on the guerrillas, if only because the PKK card is useful to him in his regional strategy.

Campaign versus Arafat launched

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES — The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is launching an international campaign aimed at stripping Yasser Arafat of the Nobel Peace Prize he won in 1994.

The Palestinian leader shared the award with then Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres for their joint efforts towards Middle East peace through the 1993 Israeli-Palestinian accords.

"The recent policy of Arafat's Palestinian Authority in issuing a death sentence against anyone selling Palestinian land to a Jew — a decision embraced by Arafat himself — makes a mockery of the Nobel Peace Prize conferred upon him," Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder of the Wiesenthal Centre, wrote to Francis Sejerstedt, chair of the Nobel Peace Prize committee.

Israel has accused the Palestinian Authority of direct responsibility for the recent murders of three Arab land dealers.

Palestinian officials have said that such land sales are crimes punishable by death, but they have sharply denied any involvement in the slayings.

"Sanctioning the murder without trial of individuals," wrote Rabbi Hier, "is a form of behavior reminiscent of the Dark Ages and reeks of the anti-Semitism invoked by the Nazis."

Rabbi Hier said he will call upon human rights organizations and advocates of democracy throughout the world to join his campaign.

Addis Ababa compound to close

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — The compound housing would-be immigrants in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa is to be closed, after steps are taken to bring to Israel all those eligible to immigrate here.

The decision was made last week by the ministerial committee on the Diaspora, headed by Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky.

Sharansky's spokesperson, Roman Polansky, stressed that the compound would be emptied gradually and that there is no target date for its closure. There are between 3,200 and 3,500 people currently in the compound, he said.

Once it is closed, immigration from Ethiopia would be processed as is immigration from any other country: Applications would be processed by the Israeli Consulate or its representatives and applicants would remain in their homes until they immigrate.

A special committee under the auspices of the Interior Ministry is to be appointed to check the eligibility to immigrate of all those currently resident in the compound, according to a ministry statement.

The investigation would be made from an agreed-upon list, based on the lists currently maintained by the Interior Ministry, the Joint Distribution Committee and community records already submitted to the government.

"Every month we will bring more into Israel and [try] to bring them all within a year," Absorption Ministry spokesperson Yehuda Glick told the Associated Press.

But Polansky said that the rate at which camp residents are brought here depends first and foremost on the cooperation of the Ethiopian government.

It will also depend on the budgets and manpower to be allocated for the operation and the cooperation of the international organizations dealing with the compound residents, he said.

He refused to characterize all those currently in the compound as Falash Mura Jews or descendants of Jews who had converted to Christianity, saying many of those in the compound had returned to Judaism.

However, he also denied reports that all the camp residents would be brought here under the Law of Return, saying that some might immigrate under the Law of Entry.

Demonstrators protest against traffic accidents

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Demonstrators gathered last week to demand more funds and better law enforcement to prevent traffic accidents in Israel.

The protest outside Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy's office came in the wake of a June 5 accident in which five members of a wedding party, including the groom and his parents, were killed on their way to the wedding.

Uri Pell, his parents Claudine and Eli, as well as two of Uri's friends, David Benishu and Ayal Yunanian, were killed when their car overturned on a Jordan Valley road as they were travelling to Moshav Hazorim near Tiberias.

The Pells, who had immigrated to Israel from France in the 1980s, lived in Jerusalem.

When the five failed to turn up by nightfall, Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg, a relative of the family, contacted security officials to begin searches.

Palestinian Authority police also took part in searches on the chance that the five were in the Jericho self-rule area.

Helicopters spotted the car the next morning in a ravine. It had apparently tumbled off the road and was not visible from the highway.

Police said it appeared that the driver of the car had been speeding and lost control of the car.

Robert Pinsky named American poet laureate

By ROBERT LEITER
Jewish Exponent

PHILADELPHIA — It's not coincidental that the cover illustration of Robert Pinsky's collected poems, The Figured Wheel, is an elaborately decorated Torah Ark from Jerusalem crafted in the early years of this century.

Pinsky was recently appointed poet laureate-consultant in poetry of the United States.

The collection's title comes from the first poem in an earlier book, The History of My Heart. The "figured wheel" is the poet's term for history, a great mass of movement that rolls through "shopping malls and prisons/ Over farms, small and immense, and the rotten little downtowns./ Covered with symbols, it mills everything alive and grinds/ The remains of the dead in the cemeteries, in unmarked graves and oceans."

"I'm interested in historical phenomena," Pinsky said in a recent interview. "And I thought it appropriate that a Jewish container for wisdom and culture be on the cover of my collected poems."

Pinsky, 56, has been called the first Jewish American poet laureate in the history of the position; there have been 38 laureates.

Joseph Brodsky, a former poet laureate, was born a Jew but didn't consider himself one and was a native of the Soviet Union.

Asked if there was anything special about a Jew holding this post, Pinsky said, "I hope it's not too significant — interesting but not significant."

He said he is happy that Jews may take pride in his accomplishment.

"I respond to that pride with pleasure and satisfaction," he said. "I'm proud of Jews and my Jewishness."

The grandson of a bootlegger and son of an optician, Pinsky was chosen for his new position by Librarian of Congress James H. Billington. His salary is $35,000 and his duties are few, mostly just to encourage the love of poetry among his fellow Americans.

This can include a significant amount of travelling throughout the country, beating the drum for poetry – either through readings or lectures – which Pinsky says he's willing to do, within reason.

Pinsky plans to organize poetry readings at the Library of Congress, but his most specific goal is to create a special audio and video poetry archive.

"I'm interested in creating an archive of Americans of all kinds, other than poets or poetry critics, reading the poems they love. I want to see what their faces look like as they read something they love."

Pinsky, who is also a professor of graduate writing at Boston University, is married and the father of three grown daughters.

As for being a Jewish poet, Pinsky said, "My history is the history of a Jewish person. I have a Jewish body. I was circumcised. I ate Jewish food, listened to Jewish music. My idea of poetry comes from Jewish speakers who had the rhythms of Yiddish behind what they said.

"But only one thing is certain — I don't write as an observant or practising Jew because I'm not."

Bank report expected soon

In an interview with The CJN, Hani, whose task is to mediate disputes between Swiss banks and their customers, commiserated with the disappointment his initial disclosure generated. And, in an aside, he expressed the hope that more money would be found in the future.

But, as he emphasized, the $1.6 million figure was in line with "realistic expectations." He firmly believes that the banks, in their search for dormant funds, have been scrupulously honest. "I can't imagine a bank not reporting correctly," he said earnestly.

And, in his view, the system works, if for no other reason than the banks managed their clients' dormant funds all these decades.

Hani indignantly rejects suggestions that the hunt for dormant funds is the final chapter of the Holocaust.

Nevertheless, Hani is under no illusions that, in addition to mediating disputes between clients and banks, his implicit purpose is to unearth hard, cold cash for petitioners.

Bound to secrecy, and considering himself neutral and independent, Hani reports directly to the Swiss Banking Ombudsman Foundation.

He claims his mandate is to be unswervingly impartial, and rejects suggestions that he is in a conflict of interest. "I have been given a free hand. I would not remain on the job otherwise."

He does not know why it took the SBA so long to establish his office, which is staffed by seven workers . But he readily acknowledges that there was an obvious need for it long before its creation in 1992.

Anyone, regardless of race, religion, nationality or domicile, can be a petitioner. But under the SBA's guidelines, five conditions must be met before a search for a dormant account is launched.

The petitioner, apart from having to prove that a bank account exists, must furnish the name of the depositor. The holder of the account should be deceased or presumed dead for at least 10 years. The petitioner must substantiate his/her claim and should know where in Switzerland the account can be located.

Someone who has reason to believe that they can fulfil these provisions should write directly to Hani and request a questionnaire. He receives 10 to 20 each day from petitioners around the globe, and about 70 percent are from relatives of victims of the Holocaust.

As of last November, 57 percent of the questionnaires submitted by petitioners required further research. The entire process, he noted, can be cleared up in as little as two months, providing the claim is legitimate.

By geographic origin, 0.7 percent of the questionnaires were from Africa; 3.2 percent from Australia/Oceania; 4.8 percent from Canada; 7.3 percent from Switzerland; 10.5 percent from Germany; 8.2 percent from Britain; 16 percent from Israel; 5.5 percent from Eastern Europe; 29 percent from the United States; 2.7 percent from the Americas; 0.4 percent from the rest of Asia; and 11.7 percent from the rest of Western Europe.

The procedure, which Hani claims is without parallel, is open to all for an indefinite period. "No time limits have been set," he said.

Each applicant must enclose a handling fee of 100 Swiss francs ($100 at the current exchange rate). "This fee has led to some public debate," Hani conceded. "Its sole purpose is to avoid abuse of the system. In practice, the fee has been waived in almost 100 cases due to the applicant's circumstances."

To the best of his ability, Hani tries to deal with each applicant individually and compassionately. "We try to clear away obstacles," he said. However, he pointed out, his recommendations are not binding.

Some applicants are bitterly disenchanted when they are unsuccessful. In such instances, it is not uncommon for them to vent anger and hurl indiscriminate accusations.

"I understand their reaction," he said.

Far too many applicants are unrealistic and believe that a jackpot awaits them. But judging by the result of Hani's last investigation, expectations should be kept in check.

Queries to Hani should be addressed to the Contact Office for the Search of Dormant Accounts at Swiss Banks, Schweizergasse 21, P.O. Box 8021, Zurich, Switzerland. Telephone: 01 213 14 60. Fax: 01 210 37 20 forced to admit publicly that an announcement by Arafat's spokespersons to the effect that the Palestinian condition had been met was simply wrong.

Even so, it was necessary to provide Arafat with a face-saving mechanism that could enable him to climb down from the limb. The United States could no longer do this, because Palestinian officials had denounced American mediators as hopelessly biased. But Egypt was eager to intercede, partly out of genuine concern for the fate of the peace process, partly to demonstrate that it continues to play an important and constructive role in regional affairs.

And even Netanyahu helped, by allowing the so-called Allon-Plus plan to leak, thereby signalling to Palestinians and Israelis that, however repugnant the details of this plan may be to Palestinians, he is not a prisoner of ideology and is as prepared as the Labor party to talk business.

In short, Arafat blinked to get the talks started. But that does not mean he will surrender to get them finished. And if negotiations simply lead to a stalemate of a different kind, everyone will lose.

Netanyahu a year later

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Benjamin (Bibi) Netanyahu was sworn in as Israel's prime minister a year ago on June 18. Elected by a razor-thin margin, Netanyahu squeaked past incumbent Shimon Peres after promising to bring the country "peace with security" and tend to the wounds caused by the assassination of his predecessor, Yitzhak Rabin.

Twelve months on, judging by an opinion poll published in the Tel Aviv daily Ma'ariv late last month, 67 percent of Israelis are dissatisfied with his performance. Fifty-six percent believe that Netanyahu's right-wing government is leading the country to war, while 58 percent think that his administration is sowing greater divisions in Israeli society.

All polls aside, the fact is that Netanyahu has taken Israel on a roller-coaster ride, leading it from crisis to crisis.

In August, Israel and Syria exchanged barbs and conducted menacing military exercises, prompting speculation whether a war was imminent.

In September, Netanyahu authorized the opening of a new entrance to the Hasmonean tunnel in East Jerusalem, touching off the worst Palestinian rioting since 1967 and bringing the faltering peace process to a standstill.

In March, the Israeli cabinet launched the Har Choma housing-project in eastern Jerusalem over the protests of the Palestinians, causing the Palestine Authority (PA) to pull out of bilateral peace talks and break off security cooperation with Israel against the backdrop of the first Arab suicide bombing in a year.

In April, the Bar-On influence peddling scandal bubbled to a head, following a scathing police report recommending that Netanyahu and his justice minister be charged with fraud and breach of trust over the appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

By the skin of his teeth, Netanyahu has weathered these crises, blaming the Syrians for war-mongering, the Palestinians for encouraging and tolerating violence and thus violating the peace accords, and the media for blowing the Bar-On case out of all proportion.

In opposition, Netanyahu railed against the Oslo process, which one of his relatively moderate ministers recently described as a "fundamental mistake" and a "disaster." As premier, however, he has pulled Israeli troops out of 80 percent of Hebron, released a number of Palestinian prisoners, eased the closure of the territories and agreed to complete three redeployments from the West Bank by the summer of 1998.

In so doing, Netanyahu has virtually fulfilled Israel's obligations, distanced himself from the core Revisionist belief that the Land of Israel cannot be partitioned and broadened support for Oslo. But in keeping faith with Oslo, he has alienated diehard constituents. No less a personage than Yitzhak Shamir, the former premier, has accused him of "working against the principles of the Likud."

In trying to manoeuvre between the requirements of peace and the demands of coalition politics, Netanyahu has angered both sides, particularly his Palestinian partners.

To mollify critics for the contentious Hebron withdrawal, Netanyahu ordered the closure of four Palestinian offices in East Jerusalem, reiterated his objection to a Palestinian state, announced a much smaller pullback from the West Bank in the first planned redeployment and went ahead with Har Choma.

Strictly speaking, Har Choma was not a violation of Oslo, but it was widely viewed as a unilateral action which contravened the spirit of Oslo and eroded what little trust PA president and PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat had in Netanyahu.

Furthermore, Netanyahu's zig-zag policies have incensed the Arabs. The Arab League has instructed its members to freeze ties with Israel, and Egypt and Jordan have accused Netanyahu of destroying the foundations of the peace process. And one year after his accession to power, Israel's strategic negotiations with Syria over the fate of the Golan Heights remain hopelessly frozen.

Netanyahu and supporters celebrate Six-Day War victory.

The Week in Israel

June 3

• Israel issued an arrest warrant for a Palestinian official, in connection to the recent murders of three land dealers who had sold land to Jews.

• Representatives of the countries who have donated funds to the Palestinian Authority convened in Washington to discuss aid to the Palestinians. The recent murders of land dealers and a report on mismanagement of public funds were expected to be raised.

June 5

• The Reform movement in Israel said it is prepared to ask the High Court to temporarily freeze its legal procedures seeking recognition of their conversions performed in Israel, on condition that the government stop the conversion bill currently in the legislative process. Negotiations for a resolution of the matter would then be held.

Wiesel issues challenge to Guelph graduates

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

GUELPH, Ont. — Young people must get involved in the global struggle for human rights, noted Holocaust author and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel admonished the University of Guelph's 1997 graduating class last week.

"You can always make a difference to the person who needs you," Wiesel told this year's convocation of social science graduates, after accepting an honorary doctor of laws degree from the university. "You can make the right decision in favor of your fellow human beings."

The author of numerous books on the Holocaust — including some recounting his own experiences as a teenager in Auschwitz and Buchenwald — Wiesel has worked on behalf of several downtrodden ethnic groups, including Miskito Indians, Kurds and ethnic Cambodians.

"I've been involved in the struggle for human rights for a long time," he said, "and more often than not, I've failed. But at least I tried."

He called on young people to sometimes challenge their governments' view of the world, with China as an example.

"There are still prisoners of conscience in China. We do not have to accept the answers of governments, that China must be dealt with because it is a major power. At least we can say no to the Chinese government as long as there are prisoners of conscience there."

'Racism is stupid'

In Rwanda's bloody ethnic conflict, "hundreds of thousands were killed. We don't even know why. Neither do they."

"Remember, education was given to us, not to be superior to others, but in order to understand the other person [and] to seek friendship, love, understanding and surely, compassion."

Racism, he said bluntly, "is stupid, unjust and ugly. You can speak up and make a difference."

He issued a challenge to the beliefs of several religions: "Suffering is not good for the human soul. Suffering confers no special privileges."

Wiesel told of the Kielce pogrom of July 4, 1946, in which 47 Jews returning to Poland from the camps were murdered by Polish thugs. On that very day, in nearby Lodz, a baby was born, and he could have given up hope. Instead, Wiesel said, he chose education, and became the University of Guelph's president and vice-chancellor, Mordechai Rozanski.

Thus, "in order for humanity to continue to exist, we must wager on hope rather than despair."

Wiesel received his honorary degree from university chancellor Lincoln Alexander, a former lieutenant governor of Ontario.

Prior to the convocation, Wiesel attended an informal reception with Israel consul general Jehudi Kinar and officials from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

Ontario Jewish student leaders gather for conference

By MIRIAM BIRNBAUM
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ontario Jewish student leaders from 11 campuses gathered recently at Maple Lake Lodge in Parry Sound, Ont., for the first annual Kol Hastudentim Leadership Conference.

The young people came to learn from each other and from professionals about being a Jewish campus leader.

One of the weekend's highlights was a lecture by Elliott Malamet, a former University of Toronto English literature professor who now teaches Jewish philosophy at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. He said that being Jewish is more than feeling good about tradition, family or identity. Being Jewish, Malamet stressed, is about truth; being a Jewish leader, he added, is about communicating those truths in a way that is compelling and meaningful.

Lively, student-run text workshops were conducted on Shabbat on topics including Contemporary and Ancient Biblical Commentaries, an Introduction to Talmud, Women in Judaism and Biomedical Ethics. The students thrashed out other issues with Rabbi Benjie Jacoby of the Jewish Education Program at an informal Rappin' with the Rabbi session.

Although the convention participants came from diverse Jewish backgrounds and had different interests, they shared a desire to understand the interests and needs of their fellow students, the more than 10,000 Jews on campuses in Ontario.

The participants were also aware that Judaism and the Jewish community will be meaningful to their less Jewishly-involved peers only if it is presented and practised it in a way that is both relevant and substantive.

A full day of the convention was devoted to leadership workshops given by campus professionals. Topics addressed ranged from active listening skills to the practical aspects of designing and running programs on campus and promoting activism. The weekend's intellectual and spiritual fare was supplemented with recreation, good food and drink, sports and social activities.

Shabbat provided an opportunity for participants to relax and reflect, but also to educate themselves further about Judaism, which many of them see as the basis of their leadership and community activity.

Kol Hastudentim is an Ontario-wide organization run entirely by students and supported through independent fundraising efforts and incentive grants from some community organizations.

Its primary objective is to pool the resources, enthusiasm and expertise of the Jewish student groups and Hillels already existing on campuses in the province. Since its inception only one year ago, Kol HaStudentim has been progressing steadily towards its goals.

For more information on Kol HaStudentim contact Jason Young at 905-731-6349 or e-mail [Shai_Spetgang@edu.yorku.ca].

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs which relate to the theme celebrating 100 years of Zionism. They must be original photos "shot" by the reader.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

In the finest European tradition, our chalah, bagels, and all our cakes and pastries are baked round the clock, so they're always up-to-the-minute fresh. Try our chalah and see if you don't agree it's the best you've ever tasted.

But we're so much more than bread!

For your parties — for your daily dining — for a quick nosh or a late night snack — Lox Stock and Bagel will receive you in style or cater it to your door with guaranteed freshness. No party is too big or too small.

Crank up your taste buds and visit us soon. In good weather, enjoy our outdoor patio at Bathurst and Eglinton and our world-famous open-air café in Centre Court at Hazelton Lanes. Either way, like they said about Camelot:

Relance Spring/Summer '97

Line honors women

Simplicity that combines both comfort and quality was the keynote for the Relance designers when they conceived the Spring/Summer 97 collection as a series of portraits, or a triptych inspired by three different women, each aware of her own uniqueness. Through talent and hard work, they all rose from humble origins to the fame and fortune that was their destiny.

The names of these three women are a reflection of their own unique style and individual temperament, and evoke their era. These images were chosen to personify the three trends for Relance Spring/Summer 97.

The MARIA line is based on Maria Callas, the young Greek-American opera singer who revolutionized the art of singing. Her intense style inspired the Relance team to create a clean line, with architectural volumes and minimalist chic: the quality of the cut and fabrics allows the woman herself to fully express her own personality.

The EVITA line is named for the wife of Argentine president Juan Peron. To the rhythm of the Argentine tango, EVITA offers a sensual, confident vision of women: styles for those seeking elegance, comfort and that indefinable extra that makes one woman stand out from the crowd.

Maria Callas, Evita Peron & Sophia Loren

The SOPHIA line is inspired by the actress Sophia Loren. In an atmosphere of wholesome laughter, brights dominate. Fruity tones of orange and apple are used for carefree coordinates mixing solids with gingham, in all-purpose jean and jacket sets and skimpy, slightly sexy little dresses or skirts.

LEFT:

TOP:
This summer's "must." The Body, here in pearl lycra, reveals a shoulder. It is matched with a full skirt and draped belt, both in Havana printed rayon.

Hat company committed to design & wearability

Heaslip Headwear (and accessories) are experiencing commanding new growth and recognition. The reason? it is the company's continuing commitment to design, inventiveness and wearability.

In Bob and Elaine Siegel's hands, Heaslip is now recognized as the creator of the most varied line of soft-structured hats: a company as successful working in leather or cashmere as in the wide variety of yarns which garnered its original fame.

And much of the new magic has to do with Liz Harbosin, their respected and established designer. Her background in men's and womenswear design, especially in leather, has been to put to brilliant effect in Heaslip's hats and now in its strong emerging line of vests.

Today the Heaslip label is found not only in more and more fashion boutiques and established department stores in North America but for the first time in Japan.

In the Party Planner of June 5, 1997 there were a couple of things that were brought to our attention:

1. On page B21 Twins Photo and Video (905-660-7385) was left out of the list of other advertising photographers.

2. On page B31 in the article "One-stop party shopping," the name of Liteworks Novelties Inc. (416-665-3329) was incorrectly spelled.

The CJN regrets these errors.

Gala to benefit summer festival of Yiddish culture

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Mordecai Richler, Al Waxman and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band are part of the line-up of artists who will perform at a fundraising gala for Ashkenaz: A Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

The gala, to be held June 23 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, will also include the official book launch of Growing up Jewish, co-edited by Rosalie Sharp, Irving Abella and Edwin Goodman.

The concert offers a sampling of the diverse artistry rooted in East European Jewish culture that will be showcased at Ashkenaz this summer, says the artistic director, David Buchbinder.

The eight-day festival at Harbourfront Centre — it runs from Aug. 25 to Sept 1 — is the world's largest, Buchbinder says.

"It may actually be the only festival of its kind. All the artistic disciplines are represented — music, theatre, modern dance, film and visual arts."

Buchbinder, 37, leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, says there has been a revival of Klezmer music in the last 10 years. He helped introduce it to Toronto audiences, but stresses that klezmer groups like his are giving contemporary interpretations of the music that emanated from Eastern Europe in the 19th century.

He notes that some of the most renowned klezmer musicians will grace the Harbourfront stage this summer, among them, the Florida-based Epstein Brothers, the subject of the film, A Tickle in the Heart; the Klezmatics and Kapelye of New York City; and the Chicago Klezmer Ensemble.

He says the gala will feature Yiddish fiddler Alicia Svigals of the Klezmatics, "one of the best of this genre; the phenomenal New York City jazz man, saxophonist John Zorn; and the great choreographer and dancer Neta Pulvermacher."

The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band

Journalist Linda Frum, who will chair the gala, says she attended the first Ashkenaz festival two years ago "out of a sense of duty" and did not expect to like the show.

But, she adds, "I had the most wonderful time. It spoke very loudly to the part of me that is Jewish. I really admired what David Buchbinder was trying to do. He had a dream to revive something that was lost to my generation. I told him I wanted to help in the future."

Frum was asked to chair the Gala by Sharp, who has been helping festival organizers since they staged the first Ashkenaz festival.

Sharp says she became involved because the music is close to her "Yiddish heart." Yiddish was her first language.

The gala begins at 8 p.m. at the George Weston Recital Hall and will be followed by a dessert reception. Tickets are available through Ticketmaster at 872-2222 and at the Ford Centre box office. A complimentary copy of Growing up Jewish will be included.

TORONTO — Most artists would be insulted if I tell them their music puts me to sleep. Mark Pinkus sees it as a compliment.

"By going to sleep, my music is putting you into a beautiful sense of relaxation. It brings a sense of peace to the listener," the 38-year-old Toronto musician says. Many people, he says, have told him they and their children have used his music to go to sleep to.

In fact, he is so aware of this particularity of his music, he's naming his tour which brings him to the De Leon White Gallery, 455 King St. W. June 13 at 8 p.m., the Bring Your Own Pillow Tour.

In January, Pinkus released his second Avalon CD Free Spirit. It hit number 30 on the "New Age Voice" Airwaves Top 50 chart one month later, charting higher than more popular artists like John Tesh and Tangerine Dream.

Like his first CD Quiet Place, which sold over 35,000 copies in its first year, his music is all piano solo with no vocals. It can best be described as "New Age" with strong contemporary classical influences.

"My music stimulates a person's imagination. It helps you face and accept your inner feelings on a deeper level and also gives you a sensation of calmness." Less Zenish perhaps his music, "is a mixture of a strong classical base with a calming atmosphere attached to it."

Not that all his songs are so completely ambient-based you forget it's there the moment you put it on.

The opening track Journey to Trust, for example, has a very strong melodic base to it. It had me humming its tune through a recent long-weekend traffic jam. My favorite song The Horse begins with a barrage of galloping chords and settles into a peaceful, slow canter.

The music, Pinkus says, is inspired by actual life experiences and each song title is a simple description of the piece. The Girl with the Red Balloon, for instance was inspired when he stepped off the subway and saw a girl in a scarlet dress holding a red balloon on a string.

Pinkus compares his art to that of a painter. "It's very visual. I compose music with my eyes. It's more visual than audible."

It's perfect mood music. I find it very relaxing listening to it at work. For some it might be great to listen to after a day of hard work to lie on the couch with a drink of brandy or a good novel.

As the song Music to Make Love To overtly implies, it's not just for sleeping.

Pinkus' CDs are available in all major record stores and on Solitudes racks in most gift shops.

Eye on Arts

DRABINSKY PROFILED IN THE NEW YORKER

Toronto theatre producer Garth Drabinsky, head of the mammoth Livent theatrical company, is the subject of The High Roller, a highly laudatory eight-page article by John Lahr in the June 2 issue of the New Yorker magazine.

The article asserts that Drabinsky has essentially reshaped the way theatre business is traditionally conducted and found new ways for creative partnerships to thrive.

It also details Livent's various theatrical hits, which continue to generate revenues in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Lahr relates that the creative team associated with Livent's much-touted production of Ragtime, which closes in North York at the end of August, is still tightening scenes, adding effects and otherwise refining what many theatregoers already considered a superlative theatrical experience.

Theatrical experience

One production opens soon in Los Angeles, and another in January in a historic Manhattan theatre complex on 42nd Street, now known as the Ford Centre, which Livent has massively refurbished.

The New Yorker piece is rightfully brimming with enthusiasm about what Livent, and particularly Drabinsky, has accomplished. It's just the kind of piece that our own Toronto Life magazine should have run — in place of the puerile, poison-pen portrait by Sandra Martin that, regrettably, appeared last February.

Richler's 'Fighting Words'

Readers of the June 1 edition of the New York Times Book Review were treated to one of Mordecai Richler's funniest essays yet on Quebec's so-called language police or "tongue troopers." Richler clearly loves being a thorn in the side of the separatists, as (for instance) when he describes an irate pet shop customer who complains because a caged parrot is speaking only English.

"If Quebec's language laws tighten just one more noteh," he writes, "I may have to write my novels in words half the size of the French so as not to antagonize our linguistic vigilantes."

Commenting on last year's Matzahgate scandal, in which boxes of unilingually labelled matzah were pulled from grocery shelves, Richler notes that the province later allowed a 68-day period of grace before, during and after the holiday.

Then he adds: "Those Jewish felons who, like me, might fancy a delicious matzaoh brei on the illegal 69th day will at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we are bonding with the Conversos of late 15th-century Spain, who also had to practise their religious rites in secret."

Oy Mordecai! Oy Quebec!

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aida Geffen

TORONTO — South African real estate magnate Aida Geffen is chair and managing director of the largest residential real estate firm in her country. Last year she was named one of the top 50 world-class executives by the Los Angeles journal Worldbusiness: The Global Perspective. More recently she was honored as one of the top 10 women entrepreneurs in the world at an international conference in Paris, France. But make no mistake about it: she has paid her dues.

"I did it the hard way," said Geffen in an interview during her recent visit here to speak at an international conference hosted by Women Entrepreneurs of Canada.

In 1958, divorced and struggling, the young mother gave up her career as a union activist and established her eponymous real estate business (pronounced Ah-eeda) on a shoestring.

She began her real estate career with little save mettle and leadership skills. (As head of the Chemical Worker's Union in the mid-'50s, she had overseen its fourfold growth.)

"I started out with no money, not even a motorcar. I couldn't get credit – that's always been a problem [for] women."

Since that time, Aida Real Estate Ltd. has grown from a one-woman operation to a 90-office enterprise with over 1,100 agents. Aida National Franchises has 110 franchised offices across South Africa, and the Aida group of companies has an annual turnover of 2 billion Rand (about $600 million) per year.

Now a stylish grandmother (and newlywed) with a direct, unexpectedly down-to-earth speaking manner, Geffen advises fledgling entrepreneurs to "be consistent, give people good service and have a good name."

As a franchiser, it's important to give franchisees service and advice, she added.

Doubtless her success was also due in no small part to her energy and innovative thinking. "I used to work 16-hour days," she recalls.

In the mid-1980s Geffen introduced "show days" (the equivalent of North American open houses) and the concept of sole mandate (exclusive listings). Twenty years earlier she had pioneered new ways of training real estate agents.

Her first show day was a smashing success. "It was a recluse's house in a fashionable area. We must have had hundreds of people."

In 1987, Geffen became the first woman on the development capital board of the Johannesburg Stock Exchange and her company the first residential estate agency to be listed.

Unlike a considerable number of her compatriots, Geffen hasn't considered emigrating. With a history as an anti-apartheid activist, she is convinced that South Africa is moving in the right direction. She also believes the country offers much opportunity for entrepreneurs to make money.

"I have such confidence in the future of the country. We've had our ups and downs. The transition didn't really help the economy. We're still going through the growing stage. It will take 10 years, but it will be a fantastic country."

Choir commemorates Yom Yerushalayim

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In its first ever North American concert, the Pirchei Netanya Boys Choir had the audience clapping, humming and swaying to the music.

The 27-member choir, of whom 15 are on this tour, consists of boys 10 to 15 years of age from the Netanya area. It performed recently at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in commemoration of Yom Yerushalayim and the 30th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem. Its second performance was at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Under the direction of Yaacov (Yankele) Rottner, the boys ran to the stage waving Israeli flags and began singing a selection of Hebrew and chassidic songs ranging from cheerful to reminiscent to melancholy.

Whether singing about Jerusalem, the synagogue or the Gulf war, the boys, dressed in white shirts, red bow-ties and black pants sang of their own experiences.

They showed a maturity beyond their years when remembering their first visit to synagogue with their fathers. "I wondered what was in the Arc, and now I know [everything.]"

In another song, the choir thanked G-d for the miracles that occurred during the Gulf War. "Forty-five missiles fell on Israel and no one was hurt." Because of their upbeat, synchronized voices, it was easy to understand that this was a song of thanks, even among those who speak no Hebrew.

In a song of anguish, they talked about the young people who went out for Purim dressed in costumes and were hit by a bomb. "Their torn costumes were on the ground. G-d help us for the kids who don't have Purim anymore."

They prayed for peace in a song about the beauty of Jerusalem on Shabbat: "Especially Friday night, give us peace in Jerusalem."

Also appearing at the concert was the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am choir under the direction of Cantor Yehuda Rottner, who arranged for the concert.

Gordons set to launch health scholarship fund

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Allan and Carol Gordon will be honored at a dinner at the Sheraton Centre Hotel June 18, in recognition of their contributions to the development of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science (CSWIS) and Weizmann Women & Science in Rehovot.

The Carol and Allan Gordon Scholarship Fund in Women's Health Research will be established using the contributions to the tribute dinner. The fund will support PhD students at the institute as they work towards understanding and developing new approaches to diseases affecting the lives and well being of women. These include breast and ovarian cancer, heart disease, osteoporosis, lupus and reproductive disorders.

A graduate of the University of Toronto, neurologist Allan Gordon is an associate professor at the University of Toronto and head of neurology at Mount Sinai Hospital and the Combined University Division of Neurology at Mount Sinai Hospital and the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

His research interests include craniofacial pain and headaches, diabetic neuropathy, malignant hyperthermia and Alzheimer's disease. Since 1992, he has served as assistant dean of development in the Faculty of Medicine. He is also co-chair of the women's health planning committee at U of T.

Gordon is currently national vice-president and chair of the Toronto chapter of CSWIS and has been involved in a number of fund-raising events for the institute.

Carol Gordon, a former secondary school teacher with the North York Board of Education now in real estate sales, has been involved in communal activities including the United Jewish Appeal Women's Division, the board of directors of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and State of Israel Bonds. She is co-founder and chair of Weizmann Women of Science in Toronto.

"Carol and I are proud of the Weizmann Institute and of our connections to it," Gordon said. "Our involvement with the institute and its programs allows us to combine support of science with support of the State of Israel."

Founded in 1934 by Chaim Weizmann, who later became Israel's first president, the Weizmann Institute of Science, with a staff of 2,400, is a multidisciplinary centre devoted to research and teaching in the natural sciences. The institute is comprised of five faculties, as well as the Feinberg Graduate School and the Science Teaching Department.

Dinner chairs are Honey and Barry Sherman. Honorary chairs are Mary and Tom Beck and Marvelle and Murray Koffler. Tribute committee chairs are Dr. Arnold Aberman and Dr. Louis Siminovitch.

Baycrest to offer home care program

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the first time, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care will offer home nursing and homemaking services, beginning in July.

The centre is teaming up with a private agency, Spectrum Health Care, to offer these services under the name of Baycrest Home Services.

The rates are still being worked out and will be announced soon, said Vice-President Moshe Greengarten.

"They will be competitive," he said.

All levels of nursing, including registered nurses, home care, physiotherapy, occupational therapy, audiology and social work, will be offered.

The move is being made to cope with the shortage of long-term and nursing home beds and the projected closure by the year 2000 of several hospitals in the Metro area, and in recognition of the fact that the aging Jewish population is growing at nearly twice the rate of the general population.

According to 1991 census data, 7.4 percent of the Jewish population in the Greater Toronto Area is over 75 years of age, a percentage that will not be reached in the general population until the year 2021.

"With this expansion of home services, Baycrest is honoring a commitment made years ago by its board," Greengarten said.

Attempts were made to work out an agreement with Senior Care, which already serves a large Jewish population, but they failed.

"There is more than enough need for both agencies to be serving the elderly Jewish population," said Stephen Herbert, Baycrest president.

Senior Care will continue to provide kosher meals on wheels, which are prepared in the Baycrest kitchen, the largest kosher kitchen in North America.

The agreement with Spectrum Health Care concludes an intensive and lengthy search, said Herbert.

Ultimately, Baycrest Home Care will reach a couple of thousand homes, but the immediate primary targets are the people already in the Baycrest system, said Greengarten

This group of several hundred people includes those discharged from Baycrest Hospital, those who attend the day hospital and day clinics, and those on waiting lists for the home and the Baycrest Terrace.

The new services will be extended to senior Jews wherever they live, in North York, Toronto, York Region or City of York.

Baycrest will be responsible for the quality of the new services, for training of the Spectrum personnel and for meeting the special needs of Jewish clients. "They will be plugged into the full range of Baycrest services," said Greengarten.

Spectrum has been established for 20 years, already serves many Jewish clients and has an excellent reputation, he said.

Pro players named to Maccabi hockey team

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They're not exactly household names, but they're certainly not shleppers either.

In fact, the quality of the talent that coach Jacques Demers, team manager Charlie Henry, and the professional scouts from the Hull Olympiques recently evaluated at a tryout camp for Maccabi Canada's hockey team did not fail to impress. Following two days of scrimmages at the Robert Guertin Arena in Hull, they selected the 22 skaters who will represent Canada at the Maccabiah Games in July.

With several professionals leading the way, backed up by a supporting cast of college and major junior players, Canada figures to be the odds-on favorite to win gold in the four-team event.

Only the Americans, with a lineup consisting of NCAA college players, should give the Canucks a tussle, but even their lineup was clouded in mystery as of last week. Former NHLer Mike Hartman has been announced as their player/coach.

The Russians as well are an unknown quantity, while the Israelis, who struggle for respectability in Pool D of the IIHF, are sure to face the best talent they've seen since they were blown out in games against the Latvian and Ukrainian national teams back in 1993.

Canada, meanwhile, boasts a lineup that Maccabi Canada official David Lisbona believes could take on the national teams of France or Britain.

NHLers Ronnie Stern of Calgary Flames, Steve Dubinsky of Chicago Blackhawks, David Nemirovsky of the Florida Panthers and onetime Los Angeles King Brian Wilks were selected to lead the Canadian contingent, though late last week Stern and Dubinsky announced they would be unable to play because of their wives' pregnancies. Todd Simon of Toronto, consistently one of the top scorers in the AHL and with Detroit of the IHL, will be getting married the week of the games and also will be unable to participate.

Even without that trio, the Canadian team figures to be strong. Others with professional experience on the team include winger Mikhail Nemirovsky, David's brother, who played in the "I" and in the Colonial League last season; forward Harold Hersh, a Montreal native who plays in Fredericton in the Habs' system; Torontonian Aaron Brand, a winger with St. John's Maple Leafs, Toronto's farm team; defenceman Stuart Marston, a Montreal native who played in Pittsburgh's system after being drafted from Longueil of the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League (QMJHL) in 1985; and defenceman Brandon Gray, a Torontonian who played in the East Coast Hockey League last season after a junior career in Drummondville of the QMJHL.

The defence corps includes Torontonian Jamie Sokolsky, who played for Owen Sound of the OHL last season and was a Philadelphia draft pick; Emanuel Labranche, a 6-foot-5 tower who played for Victoriaville Tigres of the QMJHL; Joel Bond, a native of Calgary who played NCAA division one hockey for Union College in the East Coast Athletic Conference (ECAC); Jean-Alain Schneider, Matthieu's brother, who played for McGill Redmen last season; Rob Starke, a Montrealer who played for Beaudouin College, a prep school; and Daniel Nathan, who played for John Abbott College in Montreal last year.

Forwards include Vancouver native Ryan Donovan, who played for Union College; Jamin Kerner of Montreal, who played for Harvard University in ECAC; Torontonian Michael Henrich, a rookie with Barrie Colts of the Ontario Hockey League; Montrealer Corey Pecker, a highly-touted youngster who was a first round pick in the OHL draft last weekend; Montreal native Earl Morris, a veteran of Longeuil and Drummondville of the QMJHL; and Matt Saper of Winnipeg, a rookie with Clarkson University, another ECAC team.

The goaltenders are Torontonian Greg Gardner, who played for Niagara University in New York State and Leeor Shtrom, puckstopper for Union College. Allan Lisbona and Larry Routtenberg are the alternates.

"Everyone was surprised by the level of play" at the final Hull tryout, said Lisbona, who along with Gideon Lee helped scout talent for the team. "No one expected the level of play to be that good. Even the scouts were impressed and Demers was surprised at the level of talent.

For ex-NHLer Brian Wilks, the chance to play hockey in the Holy Land is something he's been looking forward to for years. It will be his first visit to Israel and "it should be a great experience," he said.

For Henrich, a 6-foot-3, 205-pound winger with Barrie Colts, "going to Israel, competing for your country, is an honor."

Henrich, 17, was nervous going into camp and "I was really happy [to make the team]. It was a good camp and I said to myself, this is a tough team to make...There were a lot of good hockey players. There was no room for error. If you made a mistake, they'd jump on it."

Saper, a 6-foot-1, 198-lb centre at Clarkson University, said "I'm very excited about going to Israel. I can't wait to get there and see what it's like."

Jamie Sokolsky, who will re-enter the NHL draft this summer as an unsigned 20-year-old, was pleasantly surprised there were as many good Jewish hockey players at the camp. He's also thrilled at the prospect of his first trip to Israel, particularly since his mother is Israeli.

It's ironic, he says, that a busy hockey schedule has kept him from visiting the Holy Land. "Now it's my ticket to get me there."

The hockey competition will take place at the Olympic-sized rink at Canada Centre, a recreational complex built in large part with funds donated from Canada and transferred via the United Israel Appeal. It will mark the debut of the winter sport at the Maccabiah Games, which will bring together 6,000 athletes from 58 countries to participate in 40 events at the "Jewish Olympics."

- 1 tsp. lemon juice
- 2 tblsp. brown sugar

Mix ground meat with first group of ingredients. Roll into balls 1" in diameter. Heat the sauce ingredients together in a large pot. Bring to a boil, add meatballs, and simmer in sauce for 30 minutes. Freezes well. Yield: 40 meatballs.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My sister-in-law, Judy, is forever borrowing things from me. I use the term "borrowing" loosely as I never get anything back.

Last year, she borrowed a spring jacket that was never returned. She has my books, videos, CDs, pyrex cookware, even kitchen spices.

I normally don't mind lending anything I own, but I usually get the items back.

In all fairness though, I often forget that I've lent out something until I go looking for it, and then I can't remember to whom I've lent it. I feel like saying no everytime someone wants to borrow something.

I would like to go to Judy's house, do a mass search and recover all my missing items. I know this is not practical, but I can't even bring myself to mention to Judy that she has my jacket. It makes me feel petty.

Is there any appropriate way I can get my stuff returned without sounding like a shrew?

Lends A Lot

Dear Lends A Lot,

A person who lends out their belongings freely is a trusting person who wants to share with others. I don't think this is a poor trait. On the contrary, it shows you are a warm and giving person.

I can understand that Judy has left you with an uncomfortable feeling for lending things out, but if you make a "no lending" rule, it forces you to go against an endearing quality you have in your personality. Instead why not deal with the problem you have with Judy and with keeping track of what you lend out and to whom.

Write down anything you lend in a day-timer or calendar. This way you'll know where your items are.

Ask for your belongings back. There is usually no reason for someone to keep something for more than a month. Don't be shy, these are your items. You have a right to ask for their return. No one will think twice, not even Judy. You may even get an apology.

If Judy doesn't have a subscription to The CJN! make sure you lend her this week's issue.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Court ends Bar-On affair

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Bar-On affair may finally be over.

Israel's High Court of Justice rejected last Sunday an appeal to indict Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on charges of fraud and breach of trust.

The justices ruled 4-1 that prosecutors had made a "reasonable" decision when they decided in April that there was not enough evidence to indict Netanyahu in connection with the short-lived January appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

By a 5-0 vote, the court rejected petitions demanding that Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi also be indicted in connection with the affair.

Netanyahu welcomed the court rulings, saying they had once and for all brought an end to the affair that has dogged his government for months.

"We can move forward now, and focus on achieving peace and security and economic prosperity," he told reporters.

The one justice who dissented from the ruling was Dalia Dorner. She wrote that the state attorney should have been ordered to show cause for the decision not to indict the prime minister.

A three-month police investigation was launched earlier this year after an Israel Television report alleged that Bar-On was appointed as part of a deal to provide a plea bargain to Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri, who is on trial for corruption.

In turn, Deri allegedly promised his party's support for the Hebron agreement, which was coming up for cabinet approval at the time, the television report said.

Police investigators had recommended that Netanyahu and Hanegbi – as well as senior aide Avidgor Lieberman and Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri – be indicted in connection with the influence-peddling scandal.

But Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and State Prosecutor Edna Arbel decided in April that there was insufficient evidence against Netanyahu and Hanegbi, and that only Deri should be indicted.

An investigation of Lieberman's role in the affair continues.

At the hearing last month, the five-justice panel of the high court rejected petitions requesting a state commission of inquiry into the Bar-On affair and asking that the police report on the investigation be published.

Rabbis present case on conversion bill

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A delegation of leading rabbis from the Conservative and Reform movements in Israel and the United States emerged from a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu with no promises that the conversion bill would be shelved, but confident that the premier genuinely wishes to reach a compromise.

The meeting began what is to be a marathon of talks between the non-Orthodox leaders and members of the Israeli establishment, including what one member of the delegation described as "Orthodox rabbis in key positions." The only Orthodox politicians they are to meet are Transport Minister Yitzhak Levy and MK Shaul Yahalom, both of the National Religious Party.

Meeting with Netanyahu last Sunday night were Reform rabbis Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, and Uri Regev, director of the Israel Religious Action Centre. Also at the meeting were Conservative rabbis Reuven Hammer, head of the Rabbinical Assembly of Israel; Gil Nativ, its spokesperson; Joel Meyers, executive vice president of the Rabbinical Assembly of America; and Jerome Epstein, executive vice president of the United Synagogue of America.

CANADA

Hate Trial Stopped

WINNIPEG — A landmark prosecution of hate on the Internet has been shortcircuited because the Crown attorney didn't show up in court.

A Winnipeg teen was arrested last year and charged with uttering threats and possession of a weapon dangerous to the public peace, after a local gay activist received a hate message on his e-mail. Police traced the youth through his Internet server and found Nazi and anarchist paraphernalia in his room.

The case was scheduled to begin on May 23. When the prosecutor didn't show up, Judge Robert Kopstein dismissed the charges. The Crown attorney had prepared for a May 30 start date to the trial.

Order of Ontario

TORONTO — Several members of the Jewish community were among 25 outstanding people invested into the Order of Ontario last week by Lieutenant Governor Hilary Weston.

Heart Transplant

JERUSALEM — Israeli doctors have performed their first implant of an artificial heart.

The patient, a 50-year-old man, was listed in critical condition after the operation was performed last week at Sheba Hospital in Tel Hashomer.

Dr. Ya'acov Lavi, director of the transplant department at the hospital and head of the surgery team, said the operation took eight hours.

WORLD

Honors for Clemens

NEW YORK — Ben Clemens of Toronto, executive vice-president of the Great Lakes region, Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, has been named to receive the Ma'Asim Tovim (Good Deeds) Award from the region.

The award will be presented at the organization's international convention to be held July 13-17 at the Concord Hotel, Kiamesha Lake.

The Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs is comprised of some 30,000 members of Conservative synagogue-affiliated Men's Clubs/ Brotherhoods located throughout Canada, the United States, Europe and Israel.

Clemens, a native of Montreal, moved to Toronto with his family in 1970. He is a member of Adath Israel Congregation.

Homes for Children

MOSCOW — Two Jewish homes for children have opened in an attempt to confront a dire social situation in the former Soviet Union.

A new facility, which opened last week in Dnepropetrovsk, Ukraine, is providing a home for 35 Jewish girls, aged 10 to 16, from Ukraine and Russia.

ISRAEL TO AVENGE KILLINGS, MINISTER SAYS

Israel will not let the killing of Jews go unpunished, declared Minister of Housing Ze'ev Sharef at the Israel Bonds Dinner of State in Toronto Monday night.

"We do not accept that Arabs have a licence to kill Jews; we will not allow it," Sharef said. "As long as the president of Egypt can rejoice publicly over the killings, there can be no peace." (Sharef was referring to the recent massacre of 26 people at Lydda Airport.)

NEED TO GIVE MORE TO UNITED APPEAL

The Toronto Jewish Community must mobilize to increase its contributions to the United Appeal by at least 20 percent this year to assure that the vital social and recreational facilities provided by its agencies can be continued, Harry L. Wolfson, president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund of Toronto, declared this week.

Wolfson was commenting on the announcement that the United Appeal plans this year to "close the gap" between the $14,120,000 — the budgeted needs of the member agencies — and the amount collected in 1971.

This means raising $2 million more than last year. Last year's campaign fell short of its target by $500,000.

Rambam retiring from pursuit of war criminals

Cites lack of community support

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Blaming the Canadian Jewish community for not supporting him in his quest to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, American private investigator Steven Rambam is calling it quits.

"I am tired and dispirited and it is fair to say I should go on with my life. These people killed your brothers and sisters, yet you're not going to do anything about it," he said at the evening meeting of Toronto's second conference for children of Holocaust survivors, sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of UJA Federation.

Tracking down Nazi war criminals, he said, "many of whom are old men who pay their taxes and mow their lawns...is not a Canadian issue but an issue of Jewish honor. How much is a Jewish life worth if these people can kill Jewish babies and then move into Jewish neighborhoods?

"The Christian community sympathizes with us, but that's it. They are not out there in the trenches besieging their MPs. Don't have the illusion that you can be lax on the issue. You have five or 10 years at the most to recover your honor. If you don't do as much as you can, as often as you can, then nothing will be accomplished."

Armed only with a phone book, Rambam was able to find a number of war criminals living in Canada. "If nothing else," he said, "that speaks of the fact that they are unafraid living here — they feel at home. I had always understood that war criminals had snuck one by one into [places such as] Bolivia, not that they were eating at Marky's."

Although he had a list of about 1,100 names, he said, he was only able to select 200 criminals to search out. "Selecting only 200 names for me was a hideous process. How do you select who is the worst murderer of Jews?

"Of those 200 names, we found 161 without a lot of problems. They are not hiding and they are not afraid...Maybe only five percent altered their names. The others are living here under the name in which they killed Jews."

He said that although he established a false identity in order to interview these men, he "could have gone in naked with no identification. Fifty-eight killers of Jews invited me into their home and seven told how they murdered Jews. My biggest problem was not getting them to talk — my biggest problem was not killing them."

When the story appeared in the Jerusalem Post along with pictures, he said, he was "condemned by Sol Littman [of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre], who issued a press release without reading the story. Bernie Farber, [national director of community relations, Canadian Jewish Congress], however, issued a press release in support of us. He gave us credibility. If Sol had his way, the story would have died."

B'nai Brith, he charged, also issued a press release condemning his work. "There is quite a bit that can be done and should be done, that the blood of six million Jews is crying to be done, but I am not getting help. I have not received money from a single Jew in Canada. I am quitting because the chance of the Canadian Jewish community doing anything is clearly non-existent."

In an interview with one war criminal, he said, the man described taking a group of Jews to a pit and having them lie down, holding hands. "I had to ask him, 'Didn't anyone fight?'

"He told me they came and lay down and they were shot. They died like sheep. They didn't fight — no running, no fighting, no shouting.

"Your obligation as Jews on behalf of those that died is to run and fight and shout in their place. That is your responsibility," Rambam charged.

Gray named deputy PM

OTTAWA — Canada has its first full-time deputy prime minister. And he's Jewish to boot.

For Herbert Eser Gray, the appointment as Jean Chretien's second-in-command is another first. The 66-year-old eminence gris of Parliament was Canada's first Jewish cabinet minister, appointed by Pierre Trudeau in 1969, and he has served in senior cabinet posts in every Liberal government since.

Now, Gray, who has been Windsor West's MP since 1963, has risen to the highest position occupied by a Jewish politician in Canadian history.

Wearing a kippah and holding the Tanach, Gray was sworn in as the country's first full-time deputy PM along with the rest of the federal cabinet at a Rideau Hall ceremony last week.

"As the deputy prime minister, I'll be working closely with [Chretien] in the overall management and coordination of a range of government matters," Gray explained in a telephone interview.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Respect for various religious streams was pledged by Joseph Steiner, as he took over as president of UJA Federation at its annual meeting held recently at Leah Posluns Theatre.

"Pending events have the potential to rent the fabric of our unity," he said, referring to consideration by the Knesset in Israel of a bill which would legalize only Orthodox conversions.

Conversion bill opposed

The "politicization" of religion "debases" unity of the Jewish people, he said.

Earlier in the meeting, outgoing president Sandra Brown said its board of directors has endorsed a resolution by the Council of Jewish Federations (Canadian) opposing this bill and any change in the Law of Return, and asking the Israeli government to consult the Jewish Agency before submitting any legislation affecting the Diaspora.

"UJA Federation is a home for all Jews," Brown said. "We must find common ground. Do you realize how vulnerable we are as a divided community?"

The new president was described by Brown as "a second generational leader" because he is the son of the late Labor Zionist leader, Harry Steiner.

"He is intelligent, thorough, and operates from a great ethical base," she said. "In these years these are just the qualities we need."

From 1,200 to 1,500 people will attend a UJA Federation mission to Israel in February to celebrate that country's 50th anniversary in 1998, she said.

To honor Brown, scholarships are being awarded so that a number of teachers can attend a course in Jewish family education in California, Steiner announced.

Taking a step forward

Over the course of this week and next, in countless schools of countless communities across the country, commencement ceremonies will be held for students "graduating" from a successfully-completed stage of formal education.

Mostly, it is an exciting time.

Exhaling the splendid air of pride and achievement, mixed perhaps with relief, students take a step forward, toward a horizon that shines for them with dreamy possibilities, both seen and unseen.

Their parents, sighing gently, stand and watch, for they know more of the truth about horizons.

But graduation can also be a melancholy time for students. Many paths now diverge. For young people especially, must follow the stirrings of their heart, even at the cost of separation, if they are to truly believe in their own possibilities. Tearfully, friends will say goodbye with the hope that the lines of their lives will intersect at some future point.

In anticipation, therefore, of that excitement and of that melancholy, we convey our best wishes of congratulations to all students, of whatever age and in whichever community who are graduating in the next few days.

We wish also to point to the special efforts of those students graduating from institutions of Jewish learning. In most cases their workloads are heavier than that of the public school system. And the efforts of their families also deserve recognition because of the extra financial burdens they must bear in providing for their children's Jewish education.

As I have written in this column on a number of occasions, one cannot overstate the importance of Jewish education in ensuring commitment among our young to a meaningfully Jewish way of life.

Mordechai Kaplan once wrote that "where Jewish education is neglected, the whole content of Judaism is reduced to merely an awareness of anti-Semitism. Judaism ceases then to be a civilization, and becomes a complex."

In his typically pithy and almost epigrammatic manner, Kaplan expressed the essential point about the importance of Jewish education in the modern world.

If being Jewish is to mean something more to our young than a historical stigma they must tolerate or hide from, then they must be taught how and why to travel the road of Jewish discovery.

The central prayer of faith, Shema Yisrael, proclaims the education of our children to be a religious and therefore, a moral, obligation incumbent upon every family without exception. In the earliest of ancient times, this obligation was accepted by the head of the household, personally.

But very quickly in the development of the Jewish people, the obligation to educate youngsters evolved from being an individual one to being a collective one. The "community" bore responsibility for educating its children. In each Jewish community, regardless of locale, the elders were charged with the duty to establish houses of learning.

Raphael Patai, the noted Jewish thinker, pointed out that the instruction of children passed from the hands of the parents to those of professional teachers even before the end of the biblical era. Indeed, the special regard with which these teachers were held, was evidenced according to him, in the fact that they were known by no fewer than five distinct terms: omnim, morim, melamdim, mevinim and maskilim.

Therefore, to those people who teach our children, to those people whom we, the parents, have delegated our personal obligation of teaching our children, we owe an enormous debt.

In the deficit-reducing world of the 1990s in which teaching – including teaching in the Jewish school system – is considered a "public sector" line of work; and in which "public sector" work is expediently belittled by politicians; and in which, all too frequently, "public sector" employees are unfairly and callously held up for scorn and cynicism, we must acknowledge with unreserved gratitude the significance of teachers' work.

In an essay entitled Philosophy in the Talmud and the Midrash, the wise and formidable late Dr. Isaac Halevy Herzog, former chief Ashkenazi rabbi of Israel, quotes Abba bar Kahana as saying the nations of the world once asked two great philosophers of the heathen world, Balaam and Abnimos Hagardi, how they might prevail against the Jewish people. The two philosophers answered: "Go and visit their synagogues and their houses of learning. As long as the chirping voices of the children are heard there, you will not prevail against them." (My emphasis)

The "chirping voices" of the children is an elegant, sweet and totally descriptive image of the learning process. Of course, it is an image of innocence and enthusiasm, of young starlings clamoring at their mentors in chaotic cacophony for nourishment and sustenance.

But as we all know, the learning process is only innocent on the very first day of school, if at all; nor is it always enthusiastic.

It is, as we know from experience, always hard work, requiring discipline and focus. Jewish tradition and lore readily acknowledge this. The Talmud does not romanticize the day-to-day difficulty of teaching and learning.

For example, consider the following two quotations attributed to Hillel and Rav Huna, respectively.

"Reviewing a lesson a hundred times cannot be compared with reviewing it a hundred and one times."

"If a student crams, his learning diminishes; but if he gathers little by little, it shall increase."

During the next two weeks, as we watch our children graduate, as we reflect upon their achievements, let us not forget the achievements as well, of their teachers.

And let us also remember at the same time, that as long as the chirping voices of the children are heard in the halls where our teachers teach, no one will ever prevail against them.

Photographer hangs up camera after distinguished career

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joe Black is finally hanging up his camera after photographing world-famous actors and athletes, and taking pictures for The CJN for 20 years.

Hundreds of his photos bearing the credit line Graphic Artists have appeared in The CJN and he has been a familiar figure at Jewish events. At one time he was the official photographer at Maple Leaf Gardens and the old Maple Leaf baseball stadium.

As a farewell gesture, he has donated several hundred of the negatives of shots he took for The CJN to this newspaper.

Now at age 72, Black is retiring from the business, although his zest for recording history may lead him to take on special assignments.

He is selling much of his studio equipment but retaining the name Graphic Artists to protect royalties on some of his famous pictures.

And there have been many — the wedding of Elizabeth Taylor and Richard Burton, for instance, and his official photographs of the Beatles.

He still owns the building on Bathurst Street at Wellington Street where Graphic Artists is located.

Black is well into his second career as an inventor and his tee-up for golfers is selling well in United States and as far away as Hawaii.

He still plays a lot of tennis and golf even though for the past two years he has had two artificial knees.

He had to give up his pilot's license because of age but he often flew a rented aircraft to assignments in northern Canada.

It's not only as a photographer that he is well known in the Jewish community, for he is a quiet volunteer for many causes including working at the religious services at Lyndhurst Lodge for seniors.

His interest in Jewish matters encouraged him to seek out old Jewish settlements and cemeteries in western Canada when he had free time while covering Argonaut games. One assignment for The CJN took him to the old Holy Blossom Temple cemetery on Pape Avenue, south of Gerrard Street, where he saw gravestones for children who had died in the flu epidemic.

When he enlisted in the Royal Canadian Air Force he was advised to change his name from Schwartz to Black in case he was taken prisoner.

He recalls the time that he was called in by the old Toronto Maple Leaf baseball team and developed the idea of sending different action photos to the three daily newspapers. "Each newspaper would get an exclusive shot," he said.

Now he can spend more time at his three-acre property on Warden Avenue in Markham township between Unionville and Gormley, and with his three grandchildren.

Israel Pavilion set for Carabram

The pavilion will feature seven performances of an interactive, improvisational musical comedy, The Briss, by playwright Michael Rosenberg, who wrote the hit show The Wedding, which ran in Toronto in 1995.

Rosenberg advises, somewhat cryptically, for people who want to see The Briss to bring along a cucumber and sharp knife.

The pavilion will also feature performances from two klezmer bands, Soul of the Gypsy and The Gypsy Jive Band.

Ziva's kitchen will be producing blintzes and other Jewish culinary delights.

Carabram will run July 4 to 6 at Hart Lake Secondary School on Conestoga Road in Brampton. For ticket and passport information, call Har Tivkah at 905-846-5376.

IT'S CARAVAN TIME AGAIN

Early marriages would promote continuity: rabbi

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — One way to try and maintain Jewish continuity is to encourage Jewish youth to marry at an earlier age, says Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

"People who postpone marriage have a harder time finding a Jewish partner. We need to find a way to encourage them to marry earlier and we need to train our youth for marriage and parenthood," said Rabbi Dratch, the final speaker in a three-part symposium on the Jewish Family in Crisis sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Shalom Hartman Institute.

The Jewish family, Rabbi Dratch said, has clearly changed since its traditional roles were outlined in the Talmud. "Halachah sets the parameters of what has to be done ...[but] we have come to a period where we can appreciate that each individual brings certain talents into a family."

Whether certain things are performed by the mother or father, he said, the major role of the Jewish family is to maintain continuity.

"In North America today, a number of things are undermining families and we are failing miserably [at that role]."

Having Jewish children is necessary for continuity, but many people feel it is too expensive to provide them with camp, education and other necessities, he said. "Kids do not really need everything we give them. They need our time. [As well], the cost of education needs to come down. We have to make it a priority that parents can provide their children with a Jewish education and not go bankrupt."

Many children, he said, are being raised by nannies so that their parents can afford to pay for their education. "As important as a career is, however, the family must be a priority. There have to be ways to maintain a family in the proper way."

Families are up against a number of outside influences that make life difficult, he said. "Television is public enemy number 1 and it is something that is difficult to monitor. The Internet is another major problem from which kids learn all kinds of things.

"For most families today, the traditional composition does not exist. There are single parent families, blended families and divorced families, and even though the traditional family is a minority, most community programming is geared towards them. Too many people do not feel welcome in the community. More has to be done to welcome different types of families. Many families are dysfunctional — with child abuse, domestic violence or poor parenting skills. These parents are not always capable of passing on values."

Parents, he said, need to create time for each other and for their children. "Shabbat is a good time for this because they can't take part in activities that are distracting. Parents focus on themselves and on their family. By observing Shabbat, we are taking traditional patterns and imposing them on the modern family.

"People also have to fight intermarriage right away before they have kids. They need to establish a pattern of Jewish life immediately."

Only within a family, he said, can true freedom be found.

NCSY scholarships help cement Jewish identity

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Against all odds, it looks like Leah Basin is going to fulfil her dream of studying at an Orthodox girls' yeshivah in Israel next year.

An alumna of Rockford Elementary School and Willowdale Middle School, Basin pursued a growing interest in Orthodox Judaism at a young age and entered Eitz Chaim Day School in Grade 8 against the wishes of her parents.

Now completing her last year at Bais Yaakov High School for Girls, the 18-year-old, who plans to study gerontology at Seneca College on her return from Israel, is one of about 40 teens to have been named as a National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) scholarship recipient at the organization's recent senior regional convention held at Olympia Village in Huntsville.

The privately funded scholarships help graduating high school students pursue yeshivah studies, programs at Bar-Ilan University or NCSY summer Torah/touring programs in Israel.

"In our opinion, if a kid goes to Israel, we have secured a serious commitment to Judaism and continuity," said Rabbi Glenn Black, NCSY's youthful regional director.

Leah Basin

The organization, under the auspices of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America, runs programs such as Shabbatonim for junior and senior high school students, Free Torah High School (a supplementary educational program) and Jewish clubs within public high schools.

Its 4200-square-foot headquarters in a plaza at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue serves as a drop-in centre for local teens. The Canadian organization also serves students in Montreal, Ottawa and a number of smaller communities. (Some western cities are served by NCSY in American centres.)

The recent convention, attended by about 180 students, featured sports activities and an educational component, including a presentation on cults by Rabbi Michael Skobac of Jewish Campus Services.

For Rabbi Black, the highlight of the weekend was the banquet at which the scholarships were presented, an affair with heartfelt speeches about each recipient and donor.

"These kids are tremendous kids," said Stephen Rosen, who with his wife Ruthie funds nine memorial scholarships. "The fact that we have a chance to play a small part in someone's life is an unbelievable feeling. We get more back than we put out."

Qualifying NCSYers typically have helped in the community and/or made strides in their own lives, committing to a Jewish lifestyle, said Rabbi Black. Scholarship commitments totalled $50,000. Individual awards, which were instituted about a decade ago, range from $500 to $3,000.

NCSY supplements the scholarships, which don't come close to covering expenses like tuition at a boys' yeshivah, which can run $11,000 (US).

Most of the recipients, like Basin, do not come from an Orthodox background, but Rabbi Black maintains that yeshivah is "not just for Orthodox kids. It's a place where you can take Judaism a lot more seriously." He estimates that about 30 percent of NCSY members are from observant families.

Rachel Singer

Rachel Singer, 17, outgoing president of NCSY Canada, is a student at Northern Secondary School who attended Free Torah High. Although she was unsure of her plans, now that she has been awarded NCSY's David and Fran Woolf scholarship in honor of Sydney and Pearl Woolf, she plans to go to Israel in January, possibly to study at Michlelet Esther, before entering university.

"NCSY has given me such a strong bond with my community. I have a much stronger Jewish identity," said Singer, who served as a youth adviser at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

An alumna of NCSY's summer program for girls at Nevei Yerushalayim, Singer feels something is pulling her to Israel. "I hope to get a better understanding of the Torah, Judaism and where I come from."

Victor Arrobas, 18, who is graduating from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, plans to study at an Israeli yeshivah for a year, with the help of NCSY's Bleeman Family Yeshiva Scholarship. "I think it's important to learn. It doesn't matter if you start university this year or next."

Basin, who received the Poch Family scholarship award and the Jack Erlich memorial scholarship award, plans to attend B'not Torah Institute (Sharfman's).

"It's like a big miracle for me," said Basin, who joined NCSY in Grade 9. Although she felt very welcome at Bais Yaakov, it's not really meant for baalei teshuvah, she said. "I needed another place to sort of show me the love of Torah. Bais Yaakov taught me the rules of Torah and put me in that atmosphere but I still needed that nurturing, a softer approach to Judaism."

Basin will supplement her two NCSY scholarships (the Poch Family scholarship award and the Jack Erlich Memorial Scholarship Award) with private funding and at least two other scholarships (from Beth Tzedec Congregation and Mizrachi). "What I've learned is that when there's a will there's a way, even if it means moving mountains. It can happen if you really try."

An empty table

Yasser Arafat continues to move the transparent chessman on a board strewn with mounting human misery and missed opportunities. His manoeuvres are predictable, tiresome, but also bloody.

Last week and over the weekend, Palestinians rioted in the Gaza area and in Hebron. In Gaza, one Palestinian died from a heart attack, possibly brought on by tear gas inhalation, and four others were injured near the community of Morag and at Gush Katif. In Hebron, more than 30 Palestinians were hurt in a melee of stones, firebombs, tear gas and rubber bullets.

Israel has accused the Palestinian Authority (PA) of deliberately provoking the rioting. The security establishment believes the outbreaks are part of a campaign directed by the PA to "manufacture" selected crises within the territories to pressure Israel by shining a television spotlight upon the ugly violence before the accusatory eyes of the Arab and western world.

Palestinians attributed this most recent rioting to frustration and anger over the legislative recommendation passed last week by a vote of 406-17 in the House of Representatives of the United States to recognize Jerusalem as the undivided capital of the state of Israel and to allocate $100 million (US) to facilitate the move of the American Embassy to Jerusalem from Tel Aviv. By approving the bill, American legislators sent a poignant, unambiguous message to the PA and to the world that the outcome of final peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians must include a united Jerusalem. At the same time, the Americans also condemned the Palestinian policy of ultimate "rough justice" for anyone who deigned to sell property to Jews.

In typical indifference to truth or to moderation, Arafat belittled the American concern over "the real estate murders." He also pointed to a "conspiracy (American-Israeli) against the peace process." According to the Jerusalem Post, Arafat told Palestinian students that "Israel must understand that Jerusalem is the Palestinian nation's capital and will remain forever as an Arab, Islamic and Christian capital."

Then he let loose the rioters.

It is one of his favorite tactics, the gambit of bloodshed, spurning negotiation in favor of confrontation, preferring to sacrifice human life rather than to cherish and protect it.

Within this inflamed and increasingly violent atmosphere, the effort at mediation by Egypt's Osama el-Baz failed to bring the pugilistic peace partners back to the table. Indeed Israelis and Palestinians both, were skeptical of the initiative even before it began. Some Israelis questioned the propriety of Egyptian involvement, citing Egypt's unabated stream of hostile public rhetoric against Israel as well as its widely observed campaign to undermine Israeli economic and diplomatic links with African and other Third World countries. Similarly, many Palestinians discounted the Egyptian initiative as merely a ploy to curry favor in Washington.

Negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians are still at an impasse. The peace process appears moribund. The peace table is now empty. Any move to bring the negotiators back to the table must come from the parties themselves. Outsiders cannot and will not do so. The Americans have already told the parties that they have no intention of launching a new Mideast peace initiative under current conditions.

The next move on the chessboard must be by Arafat. He must consign his grisly gambit to history.

Breast Cancer risk exaggerated

Like many women, I am well aware of how common breast cancer is in North America, with one out of every nine women affected in her lifetime. Accordingly, I would have been terror-stricken by your article, "Mutated Genes Predispose Jews to Breast Cancer," which was published in the CJN, June 5, had I not realized how many inaccuracies and omissions this article contained.

Breast cancer is only slightly more common among Ashkenazi Jews than among non-Jews. Although this slight excess is probably due to a higher incidence of gene mutations which predispose to breast cancer, the majority of breast cancer cases among Jewish women, and the vast majority of cases that occur in those over 50, are not due to inherited mutations. This means that most Jewish women who have a mother or sister who has had breast cancer are not at significantly greater risk for cancer than other women their age.

The goal of the city-wide research study described in the article (for which I am the principal investigator) is to determine precisely how likely it is that breast cancer developing in a Jewish woman of a particular age is due to an inherited mutation. An essential feature of this study is that we obtain a totally representative sample of patients. We have a valid method of choosing this sample through our hospital records and do not want volunteers from the community, who might be more likely to have other relatives with breast cancer and thus could be more likely to be mutation carriers.

For Jewish women who are mutation carriers, the risk of breast and ovarian cancer is much lower than the estimates given in the CJN article. A study published last month in the New England Journal of Medicine of over 5,000 men and women in the Washington area, found the risk of breast cancer by age 70 to be just over 50 percent and only 16 percent for ovarian cancer. No excess risk of colon or pancreatic cancer was found, although there was an elevated risk of prostate cancer.

Genetic testing for predisposition to diseases that are neither easily prevented nor routinely cured raises a host of ethical and social issues beyond the scope of this letter. All participants in my study are urged to strongly consider whether they truly want to receive their test results, and, if they do, to think very carefully about the risks and benefits of sharing these results with loved ones.

Strong Kinshasa link with Canada

The article on the small brave Jewish community of Kinshasa (CJN, June 5 "The Rabbi of Kinshasa" by Elias Levy) was stirring. The connection of its rabbi with Canada was fascinating.

However, readers might wish to know two additional pieces of information.

The first is the warm relationship between Rabbi Bentolila and Canada's sole representative in Kinshasa, the head of the Canadian Bureau, Denis Gregoire de Blois, who is frequently the rabbi's guest at Shabbat dinner.

The second is the fact that the consul of Israel there, also a former Canadian, is part of a circle of friends which includes the rabbi and Gregoire.

The Canadian linkages in that perilous city are thus far stronger than those exhibited in the article.

The wife, Renata (Rachel) Debas (daughter of Samuel and Helen), married Marc Israel in Poland three years ago and they now have a baby.

They are having difficulty proving that they are Jewish and are seeking cousins named Meltser or Melzer in Vancouver.

Baba Sali story

Re: Perspectives article about Rabbi Yisrael Abichazira, the Baba Sali in The CJN, May 1.

Cantor Aviv Ouanounou's article about Baba Sali was so informative and interesting. It was very well written and explained why Sephardi Jews especially love and honor this great tzaddik!

Persecution ended 2,500-year presence in Iraq

By SASSON MAYER

About 2,000 Jewish families living in Canada were once part of a large, prosperous and influential community in Iraq. Less than 50 years ago, about 200,000 Jews lived in Iraq. Today only 30 or 40 are left.

According to the census; the population of Baghdad, the capital of Iraq, in 1917 was 100,000. Forty percent of the city were Jews, many of them educated professionals. When the first Chamber of Commerce was established in 1926, it had 10 directors — five Jews, four Muslims and one Christian.

What happened to that community that dated back more than 2,500 years, considered by some to be the oldest Jewish community in the Diaspora?

The majority went to Israel in the early '50s, many rising to positions of prominence. Included in their number were a former chief rabbi of Rishon Lezion, several cabinet ministers, ambassadors and a chief of staff.

But why did they feel compelled to leave Iraq in the first place?

In May 1948 after the War of Independence started in Israel, martial law was declared throughout Iraq. Thousands of Jews were brought before military courts and charged with all kinds of ridiculous crimes. For example, in a single day, 10 prominent businessmen, most of them over 60 years of age, were arrested and charged with participating in pro-Communist demonstrations. They were each convicted and sentenced to pay severe fines.

Adjusting to life as new immigrants in Beit Lid.

In the city of Basra, a well-known Jewish businessman was arrested and falsely charged with selling arms to Israel. He was sentenced to death by hanging.

No one was spared the barbarity of the show trials, not even a Jewish judge of the Supreme Court or the Jewish friend of the Iraqi prime minister.

Jews were forbidden to leave Iraq.

My brother, who had previously obtained a student exit visa to specialize in surgery in England, was among the last to leave Iraq at that time. In order for him to leave, he had to pay a deposit of 2,000 pounds in cash, as a guaranty of his return to Iraq.(A house in Baghdad at that time was worth about 1,000 pounds.) But even that was not enough to ensure his departure. In addition, it was agreed that I would go to the minister of the interior at his office to personally pay him 400 pounds, in exchange for his signature on my brother's exit visa.

Jews who had held top positions in most of the ministries, and who bore much of the responsibility for conducting the country's business since 1920, when the state was established, began to be fired from their posts.

Pressure was also placed on Jewish importers, whose businesses went back many generations. They began facing delays and difficulties. New import licences appeared that were issued to non-Jewish people who knew nothing about business. The head of the government ministry in charge told me one night: "If you want to continue in the import business, find a Muslim partner."

This painful situation continued, but the Jews were led to believe it was a temporary crisis that would pass like a hurricane passes, leaving damage behind but with a promise of the return to tranquillity and peace.

And in fact, some relief did arrive.

There was a change in the government and the new minister of the interior started issuing exit visas for Jews on the basis of one of three reasons: health, education and business.

Believing that the crisis was temporary, I decided to apply for a visa to England.

Throughout Iraq, however, Jews still suffered. There was high unemployment and the ever-present possibility of violence: being killed or kidnapped, of bombs being thrown, or blackmail.

It seemed to us, the Jewish community, that behind all the laws, the investigations, the trials and the torture, there was a plan to break us up and to defeat us.

A new campaign of arrest, torture and interrogation began after the defeat of the Iraqi forces in Israel. Over 2,000 Jews were arrested in a short period of time, more than 230 of them girls. All were arrested in the late hours of the night.The government even arrested parents for not knowing where their sons and daughters were.

The Jewish community in Iraq was paralyzed and had reached a low level of morale. The authorities seized on the situation to complete the "last chapter" of Jewish communal life in Iraq.

At the beginning of 1949, Nuri Al-Said became prime minister. The martial laws that had been declared in May 1948 were still in force. Al-Said used these laws to strengthen his hold on power by liquidating his opponents.

Even though he failed to achieve his dream of uniting Iraq with Syria, Al-Said, the "old fox," realized that his star would shine if he took a hard line on the Palestinian situation. The opportunity came with the events that followed the cease-fire agreements with Israel.

It was reported that early in 1949, at a meeting with the prime minister of Jordan, Samir Elrafi, in the presence of the British ambassador to Jordan, Al-Said suggested that the Jews of Iraq be loaded on military trucks accompanied by armored cars and taken to the Jordanian-Iraqi border.

Nothing further became of this report; nor was the specifically rumored action ever taken. But the dangerous situation of the Jews of Iraq became widely known around the world. The arrests and the persecutions continued

In July 1949, Al-Said suggested that an exchange of populations be made by transferring the Jews of Iraq to Israel and allowing the Palestinians to live in Iraq. These proposals were sent to Israel's representative in France through a "special" channel. Britain was said to support the idea and reportedly declared her willingness to assist.

In October 1949, a rumor" circulated claiming that Iraq had presented a suggestion in one of the committees of the United Nations that Iraqi Jews be exchanged for Palestinian Arab refugees. However, The New York Times published a letter from the Iraqi ambassador in Washington saying that Iraq totally rejected the idea of a population exchange and that the idea was a Zionist idea.

On December 12, 1949, Al-Said resigned. A pro-Egyptian prime minister formed a new government, but he was forced to resign quickly under the pressure of the Iraqi parliament the majority of whom were Al-Said supporters.

A new government was then formed by Tawfiq Al-Suwaidi. On Feb. 27, 1950, it announced that passports would shortly be made available to the Jews.

On March 10, a law was presented to the Iraqi parliament that aimed to denationalize those Jews who wished to renounce their Iraqi nationality. It was passed the same day. The law was received by the Jewish community with a great deal of astonishment mixed, oddly, with hope and despair. The Jews of Iraq realized that the curtain had come down on them and they had no choice but to face the bitter fact and leave the country – the country that they had once served loyally and proudly.

"How could it be true?", they asked

They realized they had been sentenced cruelly and were being forced to leave and to endure the unknown and the hardship of expatriation, leaving behind their all their memories, their friends and their history. Homes and their contents were sold for a fraction of their true value

Then a new law struck the Iraqi Jews. In March 1951, the government of Iraq issued a law to freeze and confiscate the assets of anyone who applied to immigrate to Israel, as well as of those who were already outside the country and would not return within 90 days. Suddenly, the majority of Jews found themselves with no means to exist while they waited to leave for Israel. When it was time to go, they closed the doors of their homes, leaving everything behind, looking back in melancholy upon a place and a past that had once been home.

But that past has not been lost. Today, in Israel, in Or Yehuda, a suburb near Tel Aviv there is a 10,000-square-feet building called the Babylonian Heritage Centre. It is a museum and research institution that documents and records the history and the traditions of the Iraqi Jewish community. The centre publishes books and produces films. The history of the Jews of Iraq is also now included in the Israeli school curriculum.

Help is on the way for agunot

Jewish divorce is the prerogative of the male partner; the husband gives a get to the wife, thus freeing her for remarriage. Should he refuse, she becomes an agunah (one who is anchored, chained, tied). Without a get, should she remarry, her children will be bastards, prohibited from marrying other Jews. The children of the recalcitrant husband with another wife are not bastards and he can marry at will (although most rabbis would, we hope, refuse to perform such a ceremony if they knew the man had refused his former wife a get).

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Legion are the stories of women whose husbands have refused to give a get. One Israeli husband died in jail rather than comply. An extreme case of a disturbed individual? Yes, but no remedy could be found by the Rabbanut over the span of decades to help these women.

And here at home? Women who have been abused, women who are forced to surrender assets to which they are legally entitled, women held to ransom by families of men who see this as a way to extort huge parts of a divorce settlement — all these are true cases of the agony of the agunah, the bound wife.

Enter a feisty coalition of women, the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get (est. 1986). In just over 10 years, this coalition of women's groups has worked a wonder in our county. They pressed the Canadian government for a secular solution (divorce being a federal matter) and in 1990, they were rewarded. On Aug. 12, Parliament passed a law declaring that "there shall be no divorce if one party retains barriers to the religious marriage of their spouse that are within their control."

According to Norma Joseph, a leader of the coalition, a recent study shows that in about three-quarters of the cases where the get was a problem, the law has been effective. Lawyers often advise the husband who is refusing to give a get that this law will seriously hamper the divorce.

"It usually works," says Joseph. "The cases usually never get to court once the spouse has sent the required affidavit to court that her husband is recalcitrant."

The judicial weapons are powerful. The judge can suspend the hearings and there will be no divorce when that happens, or where the case is argued over assets, the judge can disregard the husband's claims and rule totally in favor of the wife.

"But," Joseph cautions, "this won't work if the husband flees or the divorce was final before the law was passed."

Other ways have been tried, including vigils, requests to Jewish organizations to withhold membership and privileges from men who won't give a get, and education of women in the use of the law.

Evelyn Brook, another leader of the coalition, points out that more and more synagogues are setting policies withholding membership privileges from recalcitrant spouses (who refuse three times to appear before a beit din). The federation in Toronto has also passed a bylaw, and recently Montreal and Winnipeg have joined the ranks. In addition, there are numbers that women in Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto and Montreal can call for help.

The Montreal number is 514-731-2365. Leave a first name, phone number, and a time when you can be reached, and a return confidential call will be made. No messages are left on machines, in case the other spouse is in the house. The coalition also wants the names of recalcitrant spouses made public so that the culprit can be shunned by the peer group.

The Canadian Coalition and the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR) want more. In 1993, the Rabbanut of Israel was asked to investigate halachic solutions to this age-long issue. While the amount of literature on gittin probably exceeds the distance between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv, the rabbinic committee still sits. Meanwhile, women suffer (recall that men can remarry without halachic stigma).

According to Joseph, there are ways to approach the issue, including annulment, a clause in the ketubah, acceptable coercion and conditional divorce. As her sister in Jewish feminism, Blu Greenberg, has put it, "where there is a rabbinic will, there is a halachic way". Then what is the problem? Joseph cites two.

One is that by nature the Jewish court is a conservative body, refusing to use the remedies "expansively" instead of in small, tentative doses.

The second is the heart-breaker. There are, both women note, rabbis whose portion in the world to come is assured because they support women. But as an institution, "the beit din cannot hear the voice of women" and often women do not know how to speak on their own behalf. "If the rabbis can't hear, they need to learn how to listen. If women can't advocate, they need to learn how to advocate" on their own behalf, says Joseph.

It is here that our communities need to stand up. A video and study guide, funded by the Ministry of Multiculturalism and the Status of Women, will be available this fall. I urge communities across Canada to use this important educational tool. Sisterhoods, federations, Congress, synagogues and women's groups like Jewish Women International, Hadassah-Wizo and National Council of Jewish Women who are part of the coalition, here is your chance to educate your communities about the rights of both partners and the responsibilities and remedies available when one Jew would persecute another.

Avoiding the Golem of technology

For all the speed, efficiency — and mistakes — of computers, I have managed to avoid using them without any noticeable deficit. Unless you consider my reasonably straight back, years of unchanged eyesight and a lack of tendonitis in my arms and fingers as defects.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

So don't try to e-mail me with testimonials about modems, bytes and the Internet. I rely on hand-delivered mail, conversations, the telephone, library and personal contact for information and communication. At best, my life is less anxious without these contraptions and at worst, I'm only a couple of days behind the computer junkies who whiz and trip around their world. If they think the universe is incomplete unless it is wired, consider the metaphors and lessons produced by horror and Golem stories.

In the most famous story of this genre, Frankenstein, first published anonymously in 1818 by Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley (yes, the wife of Percy Bysshe), Victor Frankenstein, a scientist, creates an ugly creature who asks his maker to give him a mate. When Frankenstein agrees but then reneges in horror, the monster (who is given no name) retaliates by murdering Frankenstein's wife, brother and best friend.

Shelley's monster can speak and although initially gentle and cooperative, eventually turns on his creator. There is prescience in this warning about the coming scientific age and the modern computer.

It is interesting to speculate whether Shelley knew about the Golem legends that preceded her tale by hundreds of years. There are significant and important differences. A Golem cannot speak. Also, it is destroyed before it can go too far. And unlike the Frankenstein model, ultimately it is the creator that destroys the created, not the other way around.

There is also the spiritual dimension. The word Golem appears only once in the Torah, in Psalm 139, verse 16, where it is translated as "embryo," that is, something in a state of incompletion.

The most famous Golem in Jewish folklore is credited to Rabbi Judah Loew ben Bezalel, also known as the Maharal of Prague. The rabbi, so the story goes, put a slip of parchment into the mouth of his clay creation with the ineffable name of God. So long as the parchment remained in his mouth, the Golem took orders and functioned as a body without a soul. This creature helped Rabbi Loew take care of the Jews of Prague between 1580 to 1590.

On Shabbat, the rabbi would remove the parchment and the Golem would become inanimate for the day of rest. After 10 years, one Friday night, the rabbi forgot to remove the Name. The Golem grew to monstrous proportions, ran wild and threatened to destroy the very community it was meant to serve.

Unable to reason with his creation, Rabbi Loew was eventually able to snatch the Name from its mouth. The Golem of Prague toppled to the ground, a mound of lifeless clay, never to rise again.

According to other versions, the word emet (truth) was written on the Golem's forehead and when the letter aleph was erased, the word met (dead) remained and the Golem was terminated.

Computers and their electronic progeny can be overused by rapid, repetitive and impersonal interaction so that people no longer have to speak or meet. This is undoubtedly part of the allure of these artificial sweeteners of communication.

When it comes time twice a year to change the clocks in our home, I can neither spring forward nor fall back unless somebody under 30 is at home. And if it weren't for these charitable acts of technological loving kindness, there are several appliances that would blink 12:00 indefinitely after power outages. Although I have figured out how to abolish the annoying strobe effect until help arrives — a piece of black tape over the timers.

Maybe I'm just getting cranky and grumpy with age as the Golem of technology is gaining ability and memory while I'm losing my own.

The Jewish Cemetery at Newport

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807-1882) was once a household name, whose poems were taught in school and widely quoted, but I don't know whether the present generation has any notion of this splendid craftsman of verse.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Buried amongst his many creations is a poem that I recently found quoted in full on the Internet. Called The Jewish Cemetery At Newport, it consists of 15 stanzas and presents a compassionate and intelligent appreciation of the Jewish people — but ends on a note that history has proven wrong.

Newport was an early American colony and its Jewish cemetery, established in 1677, is believed to be the oldest in the United States. The first Jewish settlers in the Rhode Island town had come from Barbados. Longfellow visited the little enclave and wrote his poem of which some stanzas are reproduced here:

How strange it seems! These Hebrews in their graves,
Close by the street of this fair seaport town,
Silent beside the never-silent waves,
At rest in all this moving up and down!

And these sepulchral stones, so old and brown,
That pave with level flags their burial-place,
Seem like the tablets of the Law thrown down
And broken by Moses at the mountain's base.

The names recorded here are strange,
Of foreign accent, and of different climes;
Alvares and Rivera interchange
With Abraham and Jacob of old times.

"Blessed be God, for he created Death!"
The mourners said, "and Death is rest and peace;"
Then added, in the certainty of faith,
"And giveth Life that nevermore shall cease."

Closed are the portals of their Synagogue,
No psalms of David now the silence break,
The Rabbi reads the ancient Decalogue
In the grand dialect the prophets spake.

Pride and humiliation hand in hand
Walked with them through the world where'er they went;
Trampled and beaten were they as the sand,
And yet unshaken as the continent.

And thus forever with reverted look
The mystic volume of the world they read,
Spelling it backward, like a Hebrew book,
Till life became a Legend of the Dead.

Now comes the last stanza, written with less than prophetic foresight. But in this respect, Longfellow was no worse than some other judges of Jewish destiny. Here is his fogged vision:

But ah! what once has been shall be no more!
The groaning earth in travail and in pain
Brings forth its races, but does not restore,
And the dead nations never rise again.

Israel's ties with Switzerland unaffected by controversy

Switzerland is embroiled in an international controversy regarding the policies of its government and the conduct of its banks during and after World War II. But for all intents and purposes, these swirling conflicts have had no direct effect on Israel's relationship with Switzerland, according to Gabriel Padon, Israel's ambassador in Bern.

By Sheldon Kirshner

"We are not directly involved," said Padon in an interview in his office at the Israeli embassy.

"Israel has decided to let the World Jewish Restitution Organization handle the entire matter," explained Padon, referring to the unresolved question of Jewish dormant accounts in Swiss banks deposited by victims of the Holocaust. "It is better this way."

During the 1950s and 1960s, Israel pressed Switzerland for a full accounting of the fate of heirless Jewish assets. Israel was rebuffed on the grounds that it was not a party to the dispute and did not represent world Jewry.

At times, Israel's intervention stirred tension. "One of my predecessors was accused of interfering in Swiss internal affairs," said Padon, who bears an uncanny resemblance to the late U.S. president Lyndon Baines Johnson.

The Israeli government's calculated decision to remain publicly aloof from the controversy has not, however, insulated Israel from the fallout. "The embassy has received a few hundred anti-Semitic letters in the past year and a half," disclosed Padon, who assumed his current position in 1995, just as Switzerland's role in the disposition of Nazi-looted European gold came under intense scrutiny. "Before, we got a few such letters."

In Padon's view, Switzerland is trying to come to terms with its past. "The Swiss government has done what is possible to do, although a solution will take time, given Switzerland's political system. Of course, all this should have been done 50 years ago."

The current disputes cloud Switzerland's role, however indirect, in the birth of Israel. One hundred years ago in August, the first Zionist congress took place in the northern Swiss city of Basel, an hour's train ride from Bern. The Basel Program, which outlined plans for a Jewish state, emerged from these proceedings. Theodor Herzl, the founder of modern political Zionism, claimed he founded the Jewish state in Basel.

A century later, Israel's bilateral ties with Switzerland are on a firm footing, with at least one major irritant having been disposed of since the launch of the Oslo peace process in 1993.

For many years, Swiss companies complied with the Arab economic boycott and refused to deal with Israel. "Not so today," said Padon.

A number of Swiss corporations, spearheaded by Nestle and Movenpick, have invested in Israel. Swiss banks have discovered the Israeli Stock Exchange. The Union Bank of Switzerland, one of the largest, has opened an office in Tel Aviv. In September, a Swiss economic delegation is expected in Israel. And now, Israel and Switzerland are poised to sign a treaty to eliminate the problem of double taxation.

Trade is booming. Last year, Swiss exports to Israel totalled $1.6 billion (US). Raw diamonds led the way, followed by chemicals, high-precision machines, watches, pharmaceuticals and textiles.

Israeli exports to Switzerland, valued at $322 million (US) in 1996, were principally computer software, electronics, medical instruments, agricultural produce and military equipment.

From munitions to fire-control systems, Switzerland is Israel's best European customer of military-related products, Padon noted.

Under a licensing agreement signed about a decade ago, Israel and Switzerland jointly manufacture drones, or teleguided reconnaisance aircraft.

Israel and Switzerland enjoy a close degree of military co-operation. In the wake of the 1948 War of Independence, Yigael Yadin, Israel's chief of staff, went to Switzerland to study its reserve system. Israel embraced it, and the refinements Israel introduced were absorbed by Switzerland.

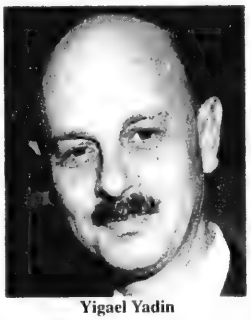
But harmony has not always been the leit motif of Israel's military ties with Switzerland. In 1971, Alfred Frauenknecht, a Swiss aeronautical engineer, was arrested on charges of spying for Israel.

He had provided Israel with blueprints of the newest Mirage jet, whose further sale to Israel France had prohibited following the 1967 Six Day War. Frauenknecht was convicted of industrial espionage and given a four-year prison sentence.

Israel's cultural links with Switzerland are vast and varied, noted Padon, a seasoned, Viennese-born diplomat who has served in Paris, New York, London and Bonn and who was once deputy director of the foreign ministry's cultural relations division.

"There is a lot going on. The Israel Philharmonic, for example, is here practically every year."

As a result of the recent spate of suicide bombings in Jerusalem and



Yigael Yadin

Tel Aviv, there has been a downturn in Swiss tourism to Israel. But terrorism has not inhibited Swiss Jews from visiting Israel: Switzerland has the highest aliyah rate per capita in Europe, and family visits are common.

Switzerland, a neutral power, has an even-handed approach in its dealings with Israel and its Arab neighbors. The Swiss not only support the peace process, but bolster it as a donor nation to the Palestine Authority, as a participant of an unarmed observer force in Hebron and as a member of the human rights working group in the now-suspended multilateral peace track.

Switzerland's relations with the Palestinians are fairly close. Before Israel's rapprochement with the PLO four years ago, Switzerland was supportive of Palestinian self-determination and therefore favored the participation of the PLO in a meaningful peace process. To that end, Swiss officials had regular contacts with PLO representatives in Bern and abroad.

In December 1988, Yasser Arafat, the PLO chieftain, used a forum in Geneva to express support of United Nations Resolution 242 and of Israel's existence.

But Switzerland's status as a neutral was not always respected by the Palestinians.

• In 1969, Palestinian terrorists attacked an El Al plane in Zurich. The Israeli security guard fired back and killed an Arab assailant. He was arrested and jailed for about a year.

• In 1970, in what by far was the worst terrorist incident in Swiss history, a Swissair plane bound for Tel Aviv exploded in midair, killing everyone aboard. The explosion was attributed to Palestinian terrorists.

Since then, Switzerland has been spared similar incidents.

The one obvious point of friction between Israel and Switzerland turns on the Magen David Adom (MDA).

For the past 48 years, Israel has been seeking the admission of the MDA into the Geneva-based International Red Cross. But due to Muslim pressure, the request has been shelved repeatedly.

Officially, the International Red Cross is independent, but in fact it is "a Swiss baby," as an Israeli ambassador here described it a decade ago.

Asked to provide an update of MDA's campaign to be admitted into the International Red Cross, Padon confined himself to two observations. "This is handled by Israel's mission in Geneva," he said. "At the moment, it's not a subject that's being discussed."

Weighing damages important when evaluating lashon hara

By REUVEN TRADBURKS

If someone asks you for a reference are you allowed to say lashon hara and tell them all the bad things about this person? This question comes up all the time in the context of discussing lashon hara, speaking evil of someone else.

We are not allowed to say bad things about another person. I cannot say "If you are having Chaim over for dinner you better prepare an extra chicken — he eats like a horse." You cannot even give this same negative impression indirectly: "They are serving lox at kiddush today and since Chaim isn't here, there is a good chance we'll even get a piece."

I have a responsibility to not damage Chaim's reputation in your eyes. I may not even use body language to convey the same information — making a face as if smelling a bad smell when Chaim's name is mentioned.

Miriam, Moshe's sister, spoke ill of Moshe in this week's parshah (Numbers, chapter 12) and was punished for doing so.

This principle of lashon hara severely shapes our conversations. When speaking of others we cannot relate their faults — they are messy, slow, lax in getting work done, unreliable, don't tell the truth.

However, what if Chaim works for me, or is a good friend of mine, and does in fact display some of these weaknesses? What if Chaim is unreliable, doesn't tell the full truth, is slow and messy? He is a nice guy, a friend of mine, but truthfully he does have his faults.

What do I do if someone calls me for a reference for this person, or calls me for my input into helping their daughter decide whether to marry Chaim? Do I tell the truth and violate saying lashon hara or do I speak only positive things about Chaim and not tell the truth?

Rav Hershel Shachter, rosh kollel of Yeshiva University, likes to point out that lashon hara is a derivative of the principle of damages. I am not permitted to damage your property. I am not permitted to damage your body by punching you in the nose. I am also not permitted to damage your reputation.

Now, what if I am faced with two conflicting damages — I can damage your reputation by speaking the truth about your unreliability or I can damage this poor young woman's future life by hiding your unreliability? Why should I protect your reputation at the expense of her life? What if the case is a case of abuse — do I protect your reputation at the expense of a child's physical abuse? Why is your reputation more important than a child's life or a battered wife's life? Even in business, why should I protect your reputation while possibly causing an employer financial loss or at least great aggravation?

In all these cases, the greater damage will be caused by protecting your reputation; in all these cases you are required to tell the truth, however damaging to this person's reputation, in order to protect the lives and property of others.

Lashon hara requires us to protect the reputation of others. However, there are many times when we have a much greater responsibility to protect the lives, both physical and emotional, of others.

Torah and technology

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In my previous column, we looked at some of the weekly Torah commentaries that are available on the World Wide Web. But what if you want to read the original Torah? No problem — if you know where to travel on the Jewish Highway.

One of the most impressive sites that I have come across anywhere is World ORT Union's Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/]. This remarkable site is a one-stop resource for anyone studying Torah. There are many goodies here, such as a calendar to look up the proper Torah and Haftorah readings for any Shabbat. And there's even an atlas map so you can follow the Israelites on the trek to the Land of Israel or illustrations of wildlife mentioned in the Bible.

But the centrepiece of this site is the online Torah. Every verse of the Torah can be viewed in Hebrew, Hebrew transliterated into English and English [http://bible.ort.org/bible/index/inx_tora.htm]. In addition, each Hebrew verse appears both the way it appears as written on Torah scrolls and in a Chumash with "nekudot" (vowels) and "trope" (musical notation). And since each verse appears as a picture rather than text, you can read the Hebrew on your computer even if you don't have Hebrew fonts installed. And last but not least, if you want to have the verse sung to you, simply click on the speaker icon and you'll hear it thanks to RealAudio [http://get.real.com/products/player/download.html].

If you want to hear another version of the Torah's musical notes sung to you, then try out Ellie's Torah Trope Tutor [http://www.mat.net/~ewackerm/]. Ellie's audio files use the .wav format. He provides a link on his Tutor page to a site where you can download free .wav plug-ins.

If you do have Hebrew fonts installed, then you should also visit the Hebrew University Bible site [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/mbible.html]. In a different approach, this Hebrew-only site has every verse of the Torah cross-referenced to any mention in the Talmud. The only drawback is that all of the Torah text is written without nekudot. Unfortunately, browsers such as Netscape Navigator and Internet Explorer cannot yet handle Hebrew text with vowels.

I haven't tried this, but apparently you can even download the entire Tanach in Hebrew and English onto your hard drive. Go to [http://www.simtel.net/pub/simtelnet/msdos/torah/] and [gopher://shamash.org:70/11/judaica/tanach/text]. Please note that these files are quite large and the downloading can be complicated.

Also, some of these files may be unsuitable for Macs or IBM-compatible PCs.

You can find a straight English translation of the Torah along with a commentary at Navigating the Bible [http://bible.ort.org/bible/index/inx_tora.htm]. The translation is taken from The Living Torah by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan. There's even a search engine on that page that enables you to search the entire Torah for a word or a name [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/util/sea.htm]. You can search other Bible translations at Brown University's Bible Browser Basic Home Page [http://goon.stg.brown.edu/bible_browser/pbeasy.shtml].

How else is technology being used to shed light on the Torah? Well, there is the raging controversy over "Torah Codes." Researchers have entered the entire text of the book of Bereishit (Genesis) into a computer and programmed it to search for unusual word patterns. And some unusual patterns were indeed found. In hindsight, the codes seem to mention the Gulf War and President Bill Clinton's 1992 election. But can these patterns be used to predict events? There lies the controversy. You can find scholarly articles on Official Torah Codes at [http://www.cybermail.net/~codes/index.htm] and a Time magazine article on this topic at [http://pathfinder.com/time/magazine/1997/dom/970609/religion.deciphering_g.html].

Jews have been the People of the Book for thousands of years. And that's not about to change no matter what newfangled technology comes along.

But there are some Torah sites on the Jewish Highway that offer ingenious features found in no printed text.

Ben Dunkelman: A hero in war and peace

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ben Dunkelman was a proud fighter in two wars for two countries, a clothing marketing whiz, a builder, an art connoisseur, a restaurateur and a Zionist who followed through on his ideals. He was also a true larger-than-life hero.

Hollywood screenwriters could not have penned a more storied life. Dunkelman even looked the part: tall, strapping and with flowing hair. But underneath the suave demeanor lurked a warrior ("by necessity, not choice," he would say) for Canada and for Israel, where he fought alongside the founders of the state.

Unlike many in his time, he was born into wealth and privilege in Toronto, where his childhood home was a rambling, English-style mansion set on a 90-acre estate known as Sunnybrook Farm.

The family's wealth was a result of his father's business success. David Dunkelman was a poor immigrant from Macover, Poland, who started a wholesale suit company on Yonge Street, which grew to become Tip Top Tailors.

Academics at Upper Canada College interested Ben little. Rather, it was on the sporting pitch where he came into his own, excelling in football and boxing.

Thanks to Dunkelman's mother, Rose Miller, the family home became a salon for visiting Zionist leaders. One of them particularly impressed the young Dunkelman. The visitor had just returned from a game reserve in Africa. "Although the world has set aside land for animals," the visitor rued, "there is none for the Jews." The man was Chaim Weizmann, who later became Israel's first president.

As an orange grower and watchman at Tel Asher, a small, windswept settlement north of Tel Aviv, Dunkelman endured backbreaking toil, sleep deprivation and the constant tension of keeping watch against Arab marauders, equipped only with an old shotgun and his physical prowess. He was paid 20 piastres (one dollar) a day — enough to buy a donkey.

But when Canada declared war on Germany in 1939, Dunkelman signed up for armed service. He joined the Queen's Own Rifles of Canada, and rose from rifleman to major. He also won the Distinguished Service Order for heroism.

His wartime exploits made news back home, when the federal Liberals offered him a safe parliamentary seat in the heavily Jewish riding of Spadina in the 1945 election. But he turned the MP's job down after his troops implored him not to leave.

Another far-off war beckoned in 1948. Even before the British pulled out of Palestine, Dunkelman had been serving as Canadian chair of the Haganah, which recruited some 1,000 Canadian volunteers to join Jewish fighters in Palestine — more than from any other country.

Dunkelman became the first member of the Machal (foreign volunteers) to sneak through the British blockade, slipping into the country on a fake British passport.

His immediate superior upon his arrival was a tall lad with a fair complexion and blue eyes. At 26, Yitzhak Rabin was the youngest brigade commander in the Israeli forces.

"We Jews have a secret weapon in our struggle with the Arabs," Rabin once told him. "We have no other place to go."

Rabin handed Dunkelman the task of re-opening the road from the coastal plain and relieving the Arab siege of Jerusalem. Using the know-how he had picked up in Europe, Dunkelman employed mortars and after a fierce fight, the unit retook the entire 50-kilometre strip.

Rabin remained a friend and even wrote the forward to Dunkelman's gripping 1976 biography, Dual Allegiance, pointing out that a grateful Israel named a bridge that skirts the Lebanese border Ben's Bridge in Dunkelman's honor.

David Ben-Gurion, the country's first prime minister, also took a keen interest in Dunkelman and named him commander of the Armored 7th Brigade, which captured all of the Galilee in the fight for independence.

During the campaign, Dunkelman met Yael Lifshitz. They were married for nearly 50 years.

At war's end Ben-Gurion offered Dunkelman the peacetime job of commanding the entire Israeli armored corps, with the rank of full colonel, and the likelihood of becoming Israel's chief of staff. But Dunkelman had to go back home to attend to his dying mother.

He took over Tip Top Tailors, and soon, children arrived. But when he visited Israel, Dunkelman would spend hours with Ben-Gurion, who would wonder, "How could you live anywhere else but Israel?"

Dunkelman became firmly established in business in Toronto, building the Cloverdale Shopping Centre and the Constellation Hotel. After a near-fatal heart attack in 1967, he sold the business, and he and Yael realized a dream by opening the Dunkelman Gallery, which was chosen as Picasso's exclusive representative in Canada. They also entered the restaurant business with Dunkelman's Fine Dining and The Daily Planet, which he sold about five years ago.

Dunkelman was fond of saying that his dual allegiance gave him the pleasure of two lives and of serving two countries he loved. Like the Spanish philosopher Yehuda Halevi, Dunkelman was in the West, but his heart was always in Israel.

Besides his wife, he leaves six children, Rose, Lorna, Deenah, Daphna, David and Jonathan, and eight grandchildren.

Toronto school board exhibit honors Jewish population

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Former and current Jewish residents of downtown Toronto, an area to which today's community owes its origins, won't want to miss a summer exhibit at the Toronto Board of Education (TBE) paying tribute to the city's Jewish population.

"Torah to Textbook in Toronto," which opened in late May in the board's lobby (155 College St.), pays homage to the city's Jewish community, especially the once-vibrant one in the downtown core, for its contributions to education, the arts, sports and medicine.

Dozens of archival photos, artifacts, books, news clips and even report cards trace local Jewry's involvement with the TBE from 1850 on (the 1846 census listed 12 "adult male" Jews in the city), and take the viewer back to the old neighborhoods, with their soda fountains, Yiddish signs, shtiebels, mutual benefit societies and, often, their grinding poverty.

Mounted by the Friends of the Sesquicentennial Museum of the TBE, the exhibit is dedicated to Willie Zimmerman, a Harbord Collegiate grad and co-founder of the Harbord Club. Zimmerman lent many of the photographs. Others came from personal collections and the Ontario Jewish Archives. It took two years to collect all the items, says exhibit committee chair Arlene Freeman.

Divided into sections, the exhibit pays special attention to now-famous Jewish graduates of Toronto public schools, among them, former mayor and MPP Phil Givens; Harry Arthurs, former president of York University; conductor Victor Feldbrill; record magnate Sam Sniderman; one-time federal cabinet minister Robert Kaplan; comics Johnnie Wayne and Frank Shuster; lawyer Eddie Goodman; and community activist and author Irving Abella.

Women aren't forgotten. A section on "Women of Valor" recalls educators Ida Siegal and Trudi Fidler, as well as Beth Sky, Ontario's first Jewish female pharmacist.

But sentimentalists will likely prefer tripping down memory lane: One section is devoted to "The Ward" — downtown Toronto's first really Jewish area — bounded by University and Yonge, and College south to Queen streets. This was before immigrant Jews spread westward to streets like Spadina, Baldwin, Palmerston and Cecil, putting additional demands on the TBE system.

Among the artifacts displayed are authentic textbooks, class pictures, pushkes, and an original "Gentiles Only" sign from the Metro Zoo in the '50s. That's offset by the original Magen David prizefighter Sammy Luftspring wore stitched on his trunks.

In all, the exhibit showcases just how effortlessly Jews found their place in Toronto, and in its public school system. Given the resurgence in recent years of the downtown Jewish community, it's all the more relevant.

The exhibit continues until September.

Warsaw Ghetto fighter had narrow escape

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Enjoying a cup of tea and homemade apple torte with John Fields and his wife Dorothy in their North York home, it is hard to believe that just over half a century ago, this quiet-spoken, gentle man was an underground fighter proficient with guns and grenades, who killed Nazis and those who collaborated with the Germans.

Special Feature

Born in Warsaw, he was 16 years old when the war broke out. His father, Lazer Feldberg, died when he was 3 years old, leaving his widow with three sons, of whom John was the youngest. The oldest, Norman, had left Poland before the war to study at Harvard University and their brother Yiddle, who was in the Polish underground, was parachuted behind the German lines in Russia and was never heard from again.

In 1942, Fields and his mother Gittle were moved with the other Jews to the Warsaw Ghetto. A Polish customer of the family's retail produce business, who was a captain in the Polish army, gave Fields false papers identifying him as an ethnic German living in Poland. Fields became a member of the underground and since he was blond and blue-eyed, he was able to move freely in and out of the ghetto.

He obtained false Polish papers for his mother; however, when he went to the ghetto on a Friday in April 1993, he learned that his mother had been taken away a few days before — never to be seen again.

Filled with grief, he was persuaded by his uncle to stay in the ghetto for the weekend. At 2 a.m. on Sunday morning, April 19, 1943, Wladek, a member of the Jewish Combat Organization in the ghetto, came to alert the population that the Germans were circling the ghetto and they were going to attack in the morning.

Throughout the night, the Jews began building barricades and bringing out guns and ammunition amassed through the underground. At daybreak, 2,000 heavily armed SS troops entered the ghetto.

"We let them move in very close to us, then we opened fire," Fields says. The Germans were stunned and many Germans were killed before they retreated. The ghetto losses were minimal.

Taking the weapons from the Germans who had been killed, the Jews continued fighting as the Germans returned over and over again. History has recorded the 27 days that the Jews displayed fierce resistance to the major attacks of the Nazis.

John and Dorothy Fields are seen in 1993 at the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

Fields describes the bravery of the Jews as they were pushed back, refusing to surrender. He recalls burning buildings, human torches, mothers throwing their children out of burning buildings and Jews taking their own lives to avoid capture.

Along with some others, Fields escaped into the sewer system, where there was panic and chaos and where many Jews drowned. Realizing that some Jews had escaped that way, the Germans threw grenades into the sewer openings.

After three days in darkness and slime, Fields, wearing a Polish underground insignia, climbed out of a manhole during the night and fainted on the road. A passing Polish streetcar conductor stopped and slapped him to revive him.

He created a story that he had been ordered by the underground to deliver weapons to the ghetto and the conductor helped him make contact with the underground, where he continued to pose as a Pole. Fields says the man later discovered he was Jewish but did not betray him.

Among his many brushes with detection and death, Fields recalls being recognized as a Jew by a German officer who called him to his office.

Rather than interrogate him and turn him in, the German allowed him to return to a labor force. While being escorted to work by the German, Fields began backing out of the line.

"I am sure he saw me escaping, but he didn't do anything. Later, I heard that he was arrested and accused of being a Communist."

Zbigniew Mitczarski, the Polish man who had saved Fields after his escape from the sewer, fought with him in the underground.

During the Polish uprising in 1944, Mitczarski was shot. Despite orders from a high ranking officer to retreat and not to return to look for wounded members, Fields, not seeing his friend, disobeyed orders and went back to look for him. Eventually, he found him wounded and sighing with pain. He carried Mitczarski back; the officer whose order he had disobeyed commended Fields.

On Aug. 1, 1944, the Poles capitulated. The Germans captured Fields along with many other members of the underground. As a Polish prisoner of war, Fields was shuffled through three PoW camps in Germany and was liberated by the British on April 27, 1945, at 13:45. This he verified by opening a small briefcase which he had carried throughout the war years, where he had listed the major events of the war on the inside cover.

Following liberation, Fields went by motorcycle to Bergen-Belsen to look for family members. He found that most of his family had perished. At the camp, he met Dorothy Weber, a young survivor from Kalwaria near Krakow. They were married at Bergen-Belsen.

After the war, Fields remained friends with Mitczarski. On the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, the Fields returned to Poland and had a reunion with his Polish friend. Several years ago, Fields arranged to have the righteous among nations citation presented to Mitczarski by Yad Vashem.

With sadness, Fields says that Mitczarski died three years ago.

The Fields have four children, Gertrude Gould, Louis, Harvey and Steven (who lives in Israel), and eight grandchildren.

Fields says he finds it particularly painful when he turns on the television and every few weeks sees Nazis in uniform wearing swastikas appear on American TV shows spewing their hatred.

"They should not be allowed to spread their poison," he says emotionally. "It is very upsetting."

Despite the ugly memories that haunt him, Fields says he is grateful to have survived. "I thank God that I have a wonderful family — good children who are educated and very caring to us."

Zimriya a success

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The annual Zimriya presented by Jewish Music Toronto presented a sampling of the rich and diverse tradition of Jewish choral music.

Dedicated to the music of Diaspora Jews, Zimriya 97 offered a varied program of songs performed in Hebrew, Spanish, English and Yiddish.

The Zimriya Chorus, a mass choir that included many members of the various groups, also premiered an original piece of music, a tradition at the festival.

Toronto-based composer Milton Barnes created the work for this occasion. His composition Sefarad, based on Ladino folk songs, was the highlight of the evening.

Barnes, who has composed for orchestras and chamber groups across the country, as well as for such artists as Erica Goodman, Moshe Hammer and Ofra Harnoy, said with so many world class Jewish choirs, Toronto is unique.

"Zimriya is a very important musical event. I wish the public would take it more seriously," Barnes added.

Charles Heller, music director at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and the driving force behind Zimriya, lamented that Jewish choral singing does not attract young people.

He noted that 30 years ago most members of synagogue choirs were in their 20s and 30s, and those same people, now in their 50s and 60s, continue to be the mainstay of most Jewish choral groups.

"We're having a problem attracting younger people," Heller said, adding that one can sing in a choir sponsored by a synagogue without joining a synagogue.

"Any choir director would be delighted if somebody walked through the door and said, 'I want to sing with you.'"

Jewish Music Toronto runs workshops offering choral singers a "phenomenal educational opportunity," he said. "We have the budget to try to bring in top conductors — national and international specialists in choral singing."

He said he was pleased to announce that the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, conducted by Esther Ghan Firestone, is the only Jewish choir to be performing at an international music festival to be held in Ottawa this summer.

Other participating choirs in Zimriya 97 included Kol Shira and Beth Tikvah Synagogue choirs, conducted by Srul Irving Glick; Temple Kol Ami Choir, conducted by Daniel Berlin; Lachan-Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, Holy Blossom Temple Singers and Ne'imot Singers, conducted by Benjamin Maissner; Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, conducted by Charles Heller; and the Heritage Singers, conducted by Edith Narvey Komisar.

Teens teach teens

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When five Toronto teens set off for Beersheva this year to teach English to Israeli high school and junior high school students, little did they suspect they'd end up teaching aerobics or running mock television game shows.

"Anything to get them talking," said Jessica Labi, 19, who was among the group of volunteers to participate in a pilot project called Kesher (Hebrew for "link"), run by Canadian Young Judaea (CYJ).

Labi, along with Sheri Chaim, Kerri Joffe, Michelle Nagy and Evan Pilz, spent three months at Eshel Hanasi, a boarding school in an agricultural moshav-like setting.

The Canadian students were also involved after hours in some of the extra-curricular activities. Some days they helped out as teaching assistants in six or seven classes, Chaim said.

Although Joffe, a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, had already been to Israel on CYJ's Biluim Israel program, this year she experienced what it was like to live there and to be with Israelis her own age, she said. "I knew I wanted to do something constructive."

Chaim who, like the others, completed high school in mid-year, wanted to work with kids. Foremost for the four students interviewed (Pilz was still in Israel) was a desire to spend time in Israel before entering university.

"We kind of made up the program on our own," said Nagy, referring to their ongoing efforts to find innovative ways of engaging the students in the use of English.

"They basically had a good background in English already, but it was hard in the beginning. We had to use our hands a lot," said Labi, who had minimal knowledge of Hebrew before going on the program.

"We learned so much about their culture, the way they are, the things they have to face that we really don't have to," said Nagy. "They're all going off to the army. They think we have it so easy."

The students, in an interview at Chaim's home, noted the contrast between the Israeli students' serious attitudes regarding army and political issues and their attitudes regarding other aspects of their life. "They live for the day," said Nagy. "Everything's a party."

Students value Israeli university programs

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — It is easy to spot them – lounging on the lawn or sitting in loose circles, laughing and joking in exuberant voices.

Even from a distance, before one can hear the English, it is obvious that these tanned, smiling young adults, gathered at the Hebrew University to attend a daylong Hillel seminar, are North Americans.

It is not so much the stone-washed denims and cotton T-shirts they wear on this hot spring day, but the overwhelming sense of confidence they exude.

"They act as if they belong here, as if they own the place," says one of the organizers of the recent seminar, which attracted North American students from five Israeli universities.

"Sure, they brought a lot of confidence with them, but Jewishly speaking, I think it really came together for them here in Israel."

"This was the best, best, best year," says University of Wisconsin student Elizabeth Lamin, who spent her junior year studying at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Sporting a button proclaiming "I Love Israel," Lamin says, "This was my first time in the country, and it really blew me away."

During her freshman year at Wisconsin, Lamin was the only Jew among 63 students on her dorm floor.

"On Yom Kippur and other holidays, I felt compelled to go from room to room and explain what being Jewish is all about," she says.

In Israel, "there's nothing to explain," she adds. "I don't have to be a teacher. I can just participate with other Jews."

Lamin, who in 1979 moved with her family from Russia to St. Paul, Minn., says that her experience in Israel has changed her life.

The product of a day school education, Lamin says she was already interested in Judaism before coming to Israel.

After spending a year in Israel, she says, "my love for the religion has grown."

Her experience has led her to believe that after college, she should move to New York or Los Angeles or "even Israel."

"I need to be a part of a bigger Jewish community. Judaism is an integral part of my life now."

Comments like these are music to the ears of David Harman, director general of the Jewish Agency for Israel/World Zionist Organization's Joint Authority for Jewish-Zionist Education.

Harman, who oversees dozens of programs for teens and young adults, believes that the most effective Israel-based programs are the ones designed for post-high school or college students, as well as recent graduates.

Referring to the 2,000 to 2,500 overseas students – three-quarters of whom are North Americans – who attend Israeli universities and programs every year, Harman says: "In terms of an Israel experience, you could not ask for a better age group."

Time in Israel contributes to formation of Jewish identities

While he wholeheartedly supports summer programs for high school students as a means of strengthening Jewish identity, Harman maintains older students can benefit the most.

While acknowledging that some Diaspora students spend more time partying than studying, Harman maintains that "a period of time spent well in Israel contributes significantly to the formation of the students' Jewish identities, and helps form the Jewish attitudes and behaviors they will carry with them in the future."

Citing follow-up surveys conducted by the university one or two years after the foreign students have returned to their home countries, he says, "The uniform picture is of greater commitment and involvement in Jewish practice, whether that be social, religious or in a leadership context.

"Our former students tell us that they're more committed to their Jewish communities in the Diaspora thanks to their studies with us," he says.

Harman, who would like to see the number of overseas students quadruple within the next few years, says that educators are constantly trying to find ways to make post-high school study in Israel a more attractive option.

"The post-high school students we get are self-motivated. They're coming because they want to, not because they're parents are forcing them to come. Their expectation is to have a good time and to bond with the country."

The real challenge, says Harman, is to attract those with fewer ties to their Jewish roots.

"Done right, an Israel experience at this age is the defining experience in [the students'] Jewish identity.

"Unfortunately, the lure of Israel and Judaism isn't as great as we'd like it to be," he says, noting that young people have many alternatives and many want to move straight into their careers.

To woo college-age youths, the Joint Authority was involved last year in launching a marketing consortium called Israel Experience Inc., which is designed to promote Israel programs to high school seniors and college students.

Harman says that it is "equally important to provide programs that young educated people will be interested in."

Courses in ecology and sports have been offered, and Harman hopes next year to attract computer, science and pre-med students with programs tailored to their needs.

Roi, whose university attracts about 1,000 North American students every year, agrees. "The key is to provide courses that students feel contribute to their goals, not detract from them."

Parents join teens at weekend kallah

WYEVALE, Ont. — For the first time in the history of the 12-year-old High School Outreach Program for Jewish teenagers living in Ontario small communities, parents were invited to part of a weekend kallah (gathering).

'Program helped reassure us about what our children would be experiencing in Israel'

Many parents took the opportunity to drive to the Wildfire Outdoor Education Centre in Wyevale (near Barrie) to participate in an information session prior to their children's July departure for a five-week study tour in Israel.

Outlining the trip's itinerary and responding to questions were the two Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region staffers who will be accompanying the youngsters to Israel — Jennifer Turack, director of community services and youth activities, and Leanne Rosen, coordinator of the outreach program.

The study tour in Israel is the culmination of CJC's three-year program which includes learning by correspondence from materials sent out by Congress, staff visits and a twice-yearly conclave for group study. Twenty-four teenagers living in communities from Timmins to Peterborough are involved.

Parents said the trip to Wyevale was worthwhile because they were able to learn more about the Israel trip as well as meet other parents and their children.

"The program helped reassure us about what our children would be experiencing in Israel," said Elaine Pepper of Cobourg. She said that the most important element of the Outreach program "is that it allows Jewish youth growing up in similar environments to make friends and to bond with others."

Her children, Amy, 16, and Jeff, 17½, a graduate of the previous program, are the only Jewish teenagers in Cobourg.

"It's hard to be a Jewish kid in a small town," said Evelyn Raab of Millbrook. When her son Dustin, 15, became part of the group, "he told me that it was the first time that he did not have to explain about his being Jewish to other youngsters."

Avi Elpern, 14, of Burlington, had initial misgivings about parents coming to the kallah, "but it went pretty well."

Volunteers Aaron Weinroth, Jennifer Shapiro, Robin Hollinger and Shira Fryer, who have spent time in Israel, were invited to the Shabbaton to answer questions and help carry out the weekend program.

Our Mission

The United Israel Appeal of Canada is the legally recognized channel for sending funds raised by United/Combined Jewish Appeals across the country, to Israel. UIA is the primary Canadian vehicle for fundraising on behalf of Israel.

UIA is a member of Keren Hayesod, the fundraising arm of the Jewish Agency for Israel in all Diaspora communities except the United States.

UIA's Mandate is to:

- convey Israel's centrality to Canadian and world Jewry
- manage the campaigns of non-federated communities
- direct and transfer funds from Federations
- document and monitor the transfer of funds to the Jewish Agency and UIA special projects
- ensure accountability for funds received and their effective expenditure
- enhance fundraising for Israel through educational programs, leadership development and training
- organize national missions to Israel and orchestrate special Israel awareness programs
- develop, implement and oversee special projects through the UIA office in Jerusalem and the Israel Residents Committee

For Our Children

For Israel

Forever

United Israel Appeal of Canada Inc.

From the President and Executive Vice President

Major changes have taken place in the 30 years since UIA's founding.

Over the years, our UJA and CJA campaigns have flourished largely because a significant majority of donors, particularly major donors, believed their contributions were critical for both their own communities and Israel's well-being. But as we approach the millennium, the emotional philanthropic attachment to Israel is rapidly diminishing. Couple this with increasing local needs and the results do not bode well for UIA and the services we support overseas.

This is especially disturbing because our own ties to Israel are slowly weakening. We need to feel connected to Israel. We need her strength, her vibrancy, her Jewish rhythms. We need the motivation and the inspiration she engenders. Losing our philanthropic connection is more about this loss than about dollars and cents.

Harvey Wolfe, President, UIA Canada

As an organization, we are at a crossroads. Either we find some way to reverse the current trends or we will cease to be a significant component of the Jewish community landscape. We must begin to eliminate the distinctions between local needs and overseas needs, and speak of a single campaign for "Jewish Needs" wherever they may be geographically situated. That means feeding the indigent Jewish elderly in Kiev might have a higher priority than local programs for seniors, or that funding Jewish education in Canada might come before funding the Joint Authority in Israel for Jewish Zionist Education. Even if the State of Israel had the financial capacity to rescue every Jew in the former Soviet Union, it is the obligation of world Jewry to share that burden.

We must immediately begin an extensive communications campaign to educate donors, Federation leaders, and the community about our incredible accomplishments in Israel during the past 49 years. Tens of thousands of Canadian Jews remain unaware of our contribution to Israel. And as we saw first hand on Mission 3000, given the right information and the right opportunity, the public will respond. We have a great product and we are determined to ensure that every contributor receives the message.

Steve Ain, Vice-President, UIA Canada

As we enter the 50th year of Israel's independence, we must change the nature of our spending overseas. Some of our traditionally funded activities will be eliminated. To do this is a painful and time consuming process, but not to do it will ensure the demise of our system. Outside of aliya, klita, and general welfare assistance inside the former Soviet Union, every program that we fund in Israel must have a strong partnership component. For in the end, we are all partners in our only Jewish state - the State of Israel. Although blemished and imperfect, she is still the single greatest hope for the Jewish people.

Finally, in this 50th year of the Third Jewish Commonwealth, we will ensure that celebrations involve as many Canadians as possible. Next February in Jerusalem, we will bring 1,500 contributors to experience the miracle of Israel. We will bring more than 100 Hineni donors to Ramat Gan Stadium on April 30th. We will gather together on Yom Ha'atzmaut in every Canadian community, not only linked electronically by satellite, but spiritually by history. We will once again take pride in all that we have accomplished together, knowing one thing with certainty. This is not an ending, but a new beginning. ✦

Jewish Rescue: The President's Priority

A life-long resident of Montreal, Harvey Wolfe's presidency of UIA Canada is one of the many leadership positions he has held since 1972, when he was asked to join Montreal's FEDERATION CJA Campaign. He eventually headed FEDERATION CJA 19 years later.

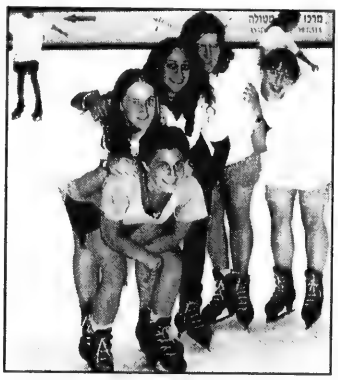
While chairing the 1995 Montreal Campaign, Harvey joined the Jewish Agency Board of Governors. The following year he was elected UIA Canada president.

Harvey has been visiting Israel regularly since 1980 when his children began spending extended periods of time there. In the last 10 years, he's made more than 30 trips. Harvey has travelled extensively in the former Soviet Union and is passionate about the importance of rescue. His quarter century of volunteer service has been fueled by a deep conviction that Jewish rescue and resettlement in Israel is the responsibility of all Jews.

"After losing 6 million I look at the exodus of Jews from the former Soviet Union as a miracle. And that miracle continues."

Harvey and his wife Roslyn, a dedicated community worker herself, frequently joke that his volunteer work leaves little time to attend to his architectural, real estate management and development businesses.

The Wolfes have three married children -- Wendy, 36; Joanne, 35; and Michael, 31 – and five grandchildren. ✦



From Israel's Capital

This year has been one of incredible accomplishment for UIA Canada's Jerusalem office.

We recently completed negotiations for an innovative educational resource centre to be built in Beersheva by Henry and Nettye Greenberg and the Montreal Jewish community. This facility is critical to Beersheva's education system which must accommodate 50,000 new olim who have recently settled there. In the northern Galilee, at Tel Chai, a youth hostel, the first in this vicinity, is being built by Toronto's Wilfred Posluns family.

The ongoing promotion of skating and hockey by Canada Centre, UIA's flagship project, is responsible, in large part, for Canada's high profile. Israel's Ministry of Education has officially recognized Canada Centre as a sports school for ice skating.

This internationally acclaimed recreation complex on Israel's border with Lebanon has developed into a vital resource – an important social venue for thousands of residents in northern Israel and southern Lebanon. Canada Centre, a top tourist attraction spawning many tourism-related enterprises, provides employment for Russian olim with hockey and skating expertise. UIA Canada capitalized on this talent by sponsoring 15 hours of skating lessons for every grade 4 child in the Galilee region. Canada Centre will also be inaugurating a hockey camp for Canadian and Israeli teenagers.

Last year, UIA Canada set new records by bringing over the largest mission to Israel in Canadian history. We hosted 1100 members of Mission 3000 to mark 3000 years since King David designated Jerusalem as Israel's capital. Now the office is gearing up for an even bigger challenge – Mission 98, with an expected 1500 Canadians celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary from February 23 - March 4, 1998. ✦

UIA

Welcoming Tomorrow

UIA Canada is an organization clearly focused on the future. Programs that sensitize Jewish youth to their history and nurture love of Israel are the basic tools for building a new generation of community leaders.

March of the Living

Over the last two years, nearly 500 Canadian Jewish high school students have participated in a life-altering experience. They joined thousands of teenagers from all over the world on the March of the Living, confronting the depths and heights of Jewish history by walking from Auschwitz to Birkenau before visiting Israel. To date, more than 1300 young men and women, from all spectrums of Judaism, have experienced this profound event.

Anguish to Hope

In May, 1997, 40 students from 17 universities and colleges across Canada set out on an emotional, 19-day journey. They observed Holocaust Remembrance Day–Yom Hashoa in the death camps of Poland and celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut on the streets of Israel. The students were members of the third Anguish to Hope mission, modelled on the March of the Living experience.

This biennial trip has left a deep imprint on participants, many of whom have rediscovered their heritage and developed a life-long link to Israel.

Kefiada

Kefiada, which began as a pilot project, with five participants, in 1995, has become

Canada's most successful Israel experience for university students. In the summer of 1997, over 100 students will volunteer as day camp counsellors, teaching English to Israeli children in Project Renewal communities. Through Kefiada, Canadian students forge strong bonds of friendship with Israeli families.

Young Leadership

UIA's young leadership programs, customized for 25-40 year old young adults, are designed to develop the next generation of community leaders.

In April, 1997, 150 delegates travelled to Ottawa for the biennial National Young Leadership Conference. It was an opportunity for future leaders to network with each other, exchange ideas and build a national leadership.

A group of 50 Canadians made up the largest national contingent, among 175 participants from different nations at Yachdav 96, the International Young Leadership Mission to Israel, held in December, 1996. Participants also visited Basel, Switzerland where the first Zionist Congress had been held 100 years earlier.

Canada Centre

Every year, some 20 Canadian students volunteer to teach hockey and skating at Canada Centre in Metulla for three to four months.

UIA and the Canada Israel Experience Centre have introduced an exciting summer hockey program there, featuring instruction by St. Louis Blues associate coach Roger Neilson and a number of NHL players. Israeli and Canadian children from 10-18, will be able to make a sports dream come true and see Israel at the same time.

The Canada Israel Experience Centre

The centre, a national organization, co-funded by UIA, local Federations, the Youth and Hechalutz Department of the Jewish Agency and the CRB Foundation, organizes, promotes and markets educational visits to Israel for high school and university-age students. In 1997, 1200 students will benefit from a CIEC-endorsed Israel program.

Gift of Israel

An education experience in Israel should be a rite of passage for Jewish youth. This ambitious objective is being accomplished through the Gift of Israel, a UIA-funded project, which enables parents to set up a special interest - bearing account in their child's name for a future trip to Israel. Many local Federations and synagogues make significant contributions to the account.

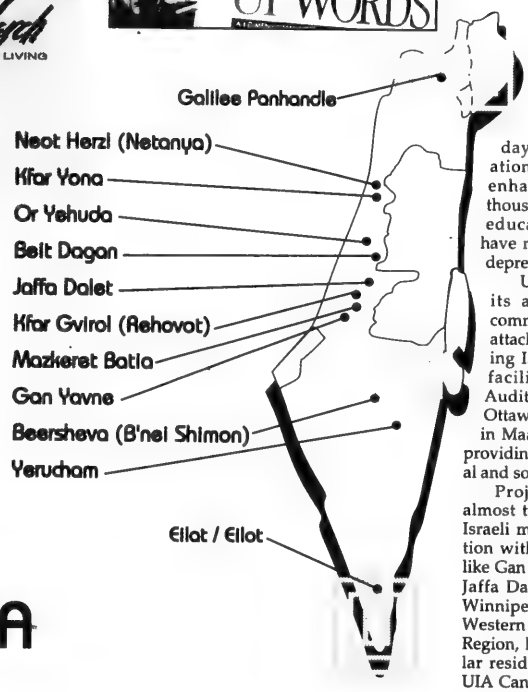
Building Human Bridges



More than 200 UIA Canada projects in Israel reflect the deep commitment of Canadian Jewry to make a difference.

Cultural centres, youth centres, day care facilities, sports and recreational complexes and libraries have enhanced the quality of life for thousands of Israelis. Many UIA social, educational and economic programs have revitalized development towns and depressed neighbourhoods.

UIA Canada is especially known for its attachment to northern Israeli communities, so vulnerable to terrorist attack. Canada Centre in Metulla, housing Israel's only Olympic-size skating facility; the Phil Granovsky Family Auditorium in Kiryat Shmona; and the Ottawa Jewish Community Kindergarten in Maalot, are part of a proud network, providing essential educational, recreational and social services to northern residents.

Project Renewal, in operation for almost two decades, has twinned twelve Israeli municipalities, requiring revitalization with nine Canadian cities. Localities like Gan Yavne, Mazkeret Batia, Kfar Yona, Jaffa Dalet and Or Yehuda, paired with Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Canada's Western Region, Ontario and the Atlantic Region, have been transformed into popular residential communities as a result of UIA Canada's investment in libraries, community centres and other capital projects.

The Montreal Jewish community, matched with both Beersheva and the outlying region of B'nei Shimon, has sponsored Beersheva's Early Childhood Education Centre, regarded as a world wide model of early childhood services. Construction is about to begin on the Henry and Nettye Greenberg Educational Resource Centre, an innovative training and development facility for educators.

Dozens of projects, such as the Collier Centre in Eilat, have been undertaken by Toronto, which is paired with Eilat-Eilot, Beit Dagan and Kfar Gvirol.

While the work of Project Renewal continues, Israel and the Diaspora will be welcoming the new millennium with a new concept. Partnership 2000 reflects the changing relationship between Israel and Canadian communities, based on mutual assistance. This new initiative concentrates on projects that build "human bridges."

These exciting people-to-people ties will be built on connections already established through Project Renewal. Canada's smaller communities have been linked with three regional colleges in Safed, Tel Chai and the Jordan Valley. Several educators from Eilat/Eilot will be visiting Toronto day schools to help with curriculum development while Montreal and other cities will send a group of teachers to Beersheva and the Galilee. ✦

Mission 98
Your Date With History

UIA Canada is preparing for another landmark mission, which will top Mission 3000, which brought 1100 Canadians from across the country to Israel in 1995.

From February 23-March 4, 1998, at least 1500 people from every corner of the country are expected to join Mission 98 to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary. The tour will take mission members from Metulla to Eilat, with ample time for festivities in-between.

UIA missions to Israel are a vital tool for solidifying Jewish identity, generating interest in local campaigns and observing first hand how campaign contributions help thousands. A mission is more than a tour of historical and biblical sites. It helps participants appreciate the social, religious, political and economic complexities of Israeli society. ✦

UIA/CJF-Canada Joint Leadership Conference

In the spring of 1997, the Canadian capital hosted the first ever UIA-Council of Jewish Federations leadership conference in Ottawa, co-chaired by Toronto's Carol Kassel with Barbara and Stan Plotnick from Montreal.

The forum offered fresh creative thinking techniques, based on The Six Hats method, which helped participants develop innovative approaches to their local Campaigns. The guest speaker was Avraham Infeld, director of Israel's Melitz Institute. ✦

Young Leadership Development Conference

Held in Ottawa, in conjunction with the main leadership conference, this series of sessions was co-chaired by Ottawa's Jackie Barwin, Diane Lallouz and Sandi Sparkman from Montreal, Judith-Finer Freedman and Bruce Leboff of Toronto, and Vancouver's Neil Pollock.

The Young Leadership Development Conference was inaugurated in 1995 to nurture new leaders and provide nationwide networking opportunities. ✦

UIA Women's Division

The Division, chaired by Joan Stevens, assists local Women's Campaigns and is planning its own leadership training program. Joan and her executive hope to promote greater participation in international women's conferences. ✦

Israel accuses PA of instigating violence

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Violence erupted last week in the West Bank town of Hebron, where Israeli soldiers fired tear gas and rubber bullets to disperse stone-throwing Palestinian demonstrators.

Last Sunday's clashes, which came in the wake of similar confrontations a day earlier, underscored the ongoing impasse in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The peace talks, along with most security cooperation between the two sides, came to a halt after Israel broke ground in mid-March for Jewish housing at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem and after a Palestinian suicide bomber killed three Israelis at a Tel Aviv cafe.

Israel accused the Palestinian Authority of fueling the weekend violence, saying it was an attempt to gain political concessions from the Jewish state.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was quoted as saying it was clear that the unrest was organized by Palestinian officials and was not spontaneous.

He added that violence against Israel would not lead to any concessions and he called on the Palestinians to work issues out through dialogue.

The unrest came after the U.S. House of Representatives passed a resolution June 10 calling on President Bill Clinton to reaffirm that Jerusalem must remain the undivided capital of Israel.

Israel welcomed the non-binding measure, but Palestinian officials said the move harmed U.S. credibility as a mediator in the region.

The Palestinians want the eastern portion of Jerusalem, which Israel captured in 1967, as the capital of a future independent state.

Palestinian sources said that more than a dozen demonstrators were wounded in the clashes near Hebron's Jewish Quarter.

An Israeli border guard was lightly injured in the clashes, according to Israel Radio.

The clashes first erupted last Saturday in Hebron when hundreds of Palestinians threw stones and firebombs at Israeli troops. More than 30 Palestinians were reportedly hurt.

Palestinian police did not intervene to stop the protesters. One Palestinian official was quoted as saying that the police were busy monitoring high school exams.

In other violence, an Israeli woman was moderately wounded last Friday night in a shooting attack in the Jerusalem hills just inside the West Bank.

Israeli security forces arrested six Palestinians from the nearby village of Bidu in connection with the shooting.

More confrontations promised

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A statement issued by the Palestinian Authority (PA) cabinet in Nablus escalated PA rhetoric of recent days, blaming the United States, the IDF, and settlers for what it said is an "explosive situation everywhere because of Israeli settlement aggression."

It warned that "the Palestinian masses will confront the settlements."

Referring to the attempt to establish a monument and fence by Morag settlement in Gush Katif, it accused "the occupying army and the settlers who took land near Rafiah" of seeking to reoccupy land that had been ceded.

"They want to cut the main road and encircle Khan Yunis," said the statement issued by WAFA, the PA press agency.

The office of the government coordinator in the territories said the fence and memorial were both placed on state land and not in PA-controlled territory, and the PA knew this because senior PA security officials had been clearly informed in a recent meeting.

The WAFA statement continued by attacking the U.S. Congress decision to transfer the U.S. Embassy to Jerusalem and to allocate $100 million for the purpose.

"Nothing is more important than Jerusalem," it said. "If the United States approves this resolution, the whole peace process will be lost," the PA's chief Jerusalem representative Faisal Husseini was quoted by Asssociated Press as saying.

Hungarian Jews get free care

BY AGNES BOHM
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — Hungarian Holocaust survivors are now receiving the necessary assistance to obtain dental care.

A dental clinic was recently opened in the Budapest Jewish Hospital to provide free service to elderly survivors.

Some 30,000 Jewish elderly live in this city.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which maintains an office here, decided to establish the clinic after several Israeli dental students had proposed the initiative.

The Israelis, who spent six years here, envisioned the clinic as a way to provide both affordable treatment for Holocaust survivors and practical training for students.

"It's good practice for us, but first of all it is for the Holocaust survivors in Hungary," Israeli student Jael Peri said in an interview at the clinic's opening. "We wanted to help them."

About 20 Israeli students will provide dental services to the patients in the Budapest hospital.

The clinic will also help other Hungarian Jews whose dental care is no longer covered by the Hungarian government.

The clinic was created with the help of the Hungarian Semmelweiss University Dental School, with funding from Baltimore's Harry and Jeannette Weinberg Foundation and the Kapsuto family of New York.

Rabbis lobby Netanyahu on troublesome conversion bill

"It was a positive meeting. [Netanyahu] said he wants a solution," Yoffie said.

Netanyahu told them that there is a good chance of a reasonable solution, Yoffie continued. It was clear to the prime minister that passage of the conversion bill would be a disaster. Otherwise he would not have initiated the meeting, Yoffie added.

Regev described the meeting of a prime minister with top non-Orthodox leaders from Israel and abroad as unprecedented.

"There was a real readiness by the government not to postpone any solution indefinitely or to put forward synthetic solutions," Regev said.

However, Hammer pointed out that the coming 2½ days of talks would be critical.

We are looking for a formula

"We are looking for a formula by which our converts can be registered as Jews, but which would at the same time give the Orthodox the feeling that these people were not exactly registered as Jews," Hammer said.

At the same time, the Conservative leader said his movement has no intention of withdrawing its petition to the High Court of Justice, asking it to order the government to recognize as Jews a number of adopted infants converted by its rabbis.

The High Court has given the government until June 30 to answer the petition, and the coalition is attempting to pass the conversion bill first.

Meyers noted that the American Jewish community is watching Israel very carefully, especially after the incident on Shavuot, in which a group of non-Orthodox Jews praying in the Western Wall plaza was attacked by Haredim and forced to leave after police said they could not protect the group.

Netanyahu "acknowledged that terrible incident," Meyers said, but made no further reference to it.

June 9

• Israel rejected a United Nations demand that it pay $1.7 million (US) in compensation for damage resulting from the shelling of a U.N. base in southern Lebanon. About 100 Lebanese refugees were killed in April 1996 when Israel fired at Hezbollah fighters who had launched an attack from a nearby area.

June 10

• Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat ordered the arrest of a security official from the West Bank town of Ramallah suspected of being involved in the murder of Arab land dealers. Hussein Alyan was arrested to prevent Israel from detaining him, according to a Palestinian security official.

June 11

• The police announced that they will investigate three ministers and five members of the Knesset in connection with their possible links to and involvement with Zvi Ben Ari, formerly Gregory Lerner, who has been charged with a number of offences.

June 12

• The Knesset passed a bill on first reading establishing the 12th day of Cheshvan to be a day of remembrance for Yitzhak Rabin.

June 13

• Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky boycotted the cabinet meeting because of what he termed "the failure by the prime minister to live up to his undertakings." Specifically, Sharansky claimed that the prime minister had promised to appoint someone from the ranks of Israel b'Aliyah as the next ambassador to Russia.

• Ben-Gurion University publicly denied any involvement in nuclear weapons research. The pronouncement came a month after the U.S. Commerce Department placed the university at the top of a list of foreign entities believed to be engaged in the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

Turkish alliance holds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Turkey's alliance with Israel looms as one of the issues likely to cause the break up of the current Turkish government and lead to new elections.

Turkey has been in a state of political turmoil since last July, when Tansu Ciller's right-of-centre True Path party formed an unlikely coalition with Necmettin Erbakan's Islamic Welfare party.

They made strange bedfellows, Ciller being secular and pro-Western and Erbakan being a devout Muslim, suspicious of Turkey's ties with the West. As well, Ciller was one of the architects of Turkey's burgeoning relationship with Israel, while Erbakan thought it should be downgraded, if not dismantled.

Nevertheless, Ciller and Erbakan papered over their differences, signing a power-sharing pact in which she became foreign minister and he became modern Turkey's first Islamic prime minister. For a Muslim country which had undergone a secular revolution in the 1920s and 1930s under the guiding hand of the still revered Mustafa Kemal (Ataturk), this was an amazing turn of events.

But given Turkey's deeply-ingrained Kemalist legacy, rigorously enforced by the armed forces, which have staged three coup d'etats since 1960 to enforce their will on civilian governments, Ciller's marriage of convenience with Erbakan was doomed.

From the outset, the Islamic Welfare party has tried to imprint its values on Turkish society, thereby incurring the wrath of the generals. Accusing Erbakan of weakening Turkey's democracy and legal system by "blurring the distinction between the secular and the anti-secular," they demanded the closure of Islamic-oriented secondary schools and the cancellation of prohibitions permitting the wearing of Islamic headscarves in public institutions.

In a further show of force, the army purged pro-Islamic officers from its ranks, and dispatched a column of tanks through a suburb of Ankara after Iran's ambassador to Turkey delivered a speech there calling for strict Islamic rule in Turkey.

The crisis worsened when Turkey's chief prosecutor accused Erbakan of acting against secularism in violation of electoral laws and urged the Constitutional Court to shut down the Islamic Welfare party.

As if these developments were not serious enough, Erbakan alienated the army by dragging his feet in implementing agreements with Israel on free trade, defence industry cooperation and military cooperation. Erbakan, however, has failed to sabotage these accords, the first of which was signed in February 1996.

They are wide-ranging in scope. Turkey's trade with Israel is to be quadrupled to $2.5 billion (US) within three years. In a $650 million contract, Israel is to upgrade 54 of Turkey's F-4 Phantom jets. Israel and Turkey are to jointly produce the Popeye II air-to-ground missile. Israeli aircraft are free to train in Turkish airspace. Israel and Turkey are to engage in a strategic dialogue and to share intelligence data.

And in the latest twist, Israel, Turkey and the United States are scheduled to conduct naval exercises in the Mediterranean Sea this summer.

Turkey views these agreements as vital to its interests. It is concerned over Iran's regional ambitions and its military buildup. It has a border dispute with Syria and resents Syria's support of Kurdish separatists. It mistrusts Iraq. It needs Israel to balance its relations with the Arab world, and regards Israel as a dependable supplier of sophisticated weaponry.

In an effort to consolidate links, Israel and Turkey have exchanged three high-level visits of late. Foreign Minister David Levy met with Erbakan, though Erbakan was reluctant to receive him and used the occasion to blast Israeli policies. Subsequently, Turhan Tayan, the defence minister, and Ismail Karadayi, the chief of staff, visited Israel.

It's clear that Erbakan dislikes Turkey's evolving friendship with Israel. But it's also clear that he is is no position to stop it.

Israeli cabinet shuffle said in the works

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is weighing several major changes in his cabinet, to allow for the possible appointment of former justice minister Ya'acov Ne'eman to a cabinet post, following the High Court of Justice decision not to order any more indictments in the Bar-On Affair.

The prospective reshuffling of portfolios could result in Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi's being offered another key ministry, a senior Netanyahu aide said.

"The prime minister is obligated to keep the promise he made to bring Ne'eman back into the cabinet," the aide said, noting, however, that Ne'eman's options "may not be limited to the Justice Ministry.

"It will be possible to find a role for Ne'eman to fill or to come up with some other creative solution," he said, so that Hanegbi could remain in his post.

This could open the way for the Science portfolio to be awarded to Likud MK Sylvan Shalom, the leading candidate. Ze'ev Begin gave up that post five months ago.

Netanyahu evidently considered shifting Hanegbi to an alternate position of comparable status, but "did not want to undermine his position while he was under a cloud of suspicion, and the High Court's verdict had not been reached," the aide said.

Indicating that he now feels his energy can be redirected toward urgent national issues such as the pursuit of peace, Netanyahu said, "This affair is behind us. I intend to move forward and to deal now with the problems connected to achieving peace and security and economic prosperity for the State of Israel."

Dissenting opinion

Labor MK Yossi Beilin, who filed one of the petitions to the High Court, stressed the dissenting opinion of Justice Dalia Dorner, who believed that Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein should be ordered to explain his decision not to indict Netanyahu.

"This means 20 percent of the panel thought this prime minister should stand trial," Beilin said, terming the verdict a political earthquake. "I think today the countdown has begun on Benjamin Netanyahu's rule."

But the prime minister's communications director, David Bar-Illan, scoffed at Beilin's assessment, saying, "This is the first time in the history of democratic government that a minority opinion has been characterized as a victory."

Bar-Illan contended that this is not a legitimate way to bring down a government, which he conceded is the opposition's legitimate objective.

"People who until now loudly preached the supremacy of the law are not prepared to accept the verdict of the court because it does not conform to their expectations," he said.

Last kibbutz children's house closes

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — One of the last traditions of kibbutz living, the children's house, is now a thing of the past.

Among Israel's kibbutzim, Baram was the last holdout to the principle of children's houses, where boys and girls of the same age group lived together, visiting their parents during the day.

After a stormy debate, the decision to do away with the children's houses was made more than a year ago.

But kibbutz members said time was needed to expand the parents' homes to make room for their children, adding that a delay was also necessary to enable residents to adapt to the change in lifestyle.

Romania offers to host Israel-Syria peace talks

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Romania has offered to host peace talks between Israel and Syria, suggesting that other Arab states also could enjoy Romanian hospitality and discretion in a Balkan version of Camp David.

Deputy Prime Minister Adrian Severin made the proposal to Foreign Minister David Levy at a meeting last Sunday, during which he also urged him to support Romania's application for NATO membership.

Israeli diplomatic sources reacted favorably to the peacemaking format described by Severin, who also serves as foreign minister. They recalled that the late president Nicolae Ceausescu helped set the stage for the Egyptian-Israeli rapprochement culminating in the late president Anwar Sadat's visit in November 1977.

David Levy

Not only does Bucharest maintain cordial relations with Syria, but its foreign policy always has been friendly toward Israel. It did not follow the former USSR's lead in severing relations.

Severin's bid for Israeli backing on the NATO expansion issue was prompted by the U.S.-led alliance's upcoming conference in Madrid on July 8.

Israeli diplomats favor Romanian membership on the grounds that Romania constitutes a stabilizing factor in the Balkans.

At the bilateral level, Levy and Severin discussed the feasibility of a quota that could regulate the number of Romanian laborers in this country, only 70,000 of whom are here legally. The idea is that the respective governments would supervise the terms of their employment.

The two also signed an agreement eliminating double taxation between the two countries.

DREAMING OF ISRAEL

Even though she is only 2½ years-old, the expression on young Tamara Sidgy's face seems to express perfectly the dreaminess and rapture of the recent celebrations at the Israel Day Festival at Mel Lastman Square in North York. The festival was a commemorative tribute to the centenary of the first Zionist congress, which was held in the late summer months of 1897 in Basel, Switzerland. The annual festival event was sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation, central region. [Ron Csillag photo]

Hilly Shephelah the site of many biblical events

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The Israelites and Philistines clashed in olden days in the Shephelah, a high region southwest of Jerusalem typified by rolling hills.

It was in this district's ancient city of Bet Shemesh that the Israelites regained the Holy Ark of the Covenant from the Philistines, who had earlier captured it in battle.

Adullam, also in the same region in the southern ancient kingdom of Judah, is famous as the spot where Samson was born and where he slew the lion with his bare hands and later the Philistines with the jawbone of an ass. Another monumental clash occurred nearby in the Valley of Ela when the young David used his slingshot to bring down Goliath.

These are among the important biblical sites one passes on the drive to Beit Guvrin and Tel Maresha, neighboring sites of antiquity situated about a 45-minute journey southwest of Jerusalem, adjacent to the modern kibbutz of Beit Guvrin.

The site still seems largely rural and unspoiled. Looking west towards the Mediterranean coast, one can just make out the port city of Ashqelon in the distance. Looking eastward into the West Bank, one can see the distant holy city of Hebron, where the biblical Abraham and Sarah are buried.

On this spot archeologists have discovered the remains of a large city of caves. The upper city stood atop Tel Maresha, the 33-metre ancient tell also known as Tell Sandahannah because of a medieval church that once stood here devoted to Saint Anna. In the lower city beside the tell, archeologists have discovered hundreds of large manmade cave complexes, several with spectacular painted walls.

Excavations in the tell, the most prominent hill in the vicinity, show two lines of defensive walls, some more than three metres thick, dating to the Hellenistic period (334 to 132 BCE) after Alexander the Great's conquest of Judea. Historians reckon that Maresha was a thriving city of between 6,000 and 10,000 residents in this era. However, some caves date back to the late Iron Age (8th century BCE) and the Persian period (4th century BCE).

Visitors may descend into some of the cave complexes, some of which have been rigged with electric lights and guardrails for safety purposes.

In one of the caves I visited, one descends down via a graceful serpentine stairway and other stairways at least 75 steps into the earth.

Carved into the soft chalky limestone, many of the cave complexes were used for the production of olive oil for export to Egypt. By one estimate, no less than 300 metric tons emanated from some 30 processing plants here. Some caves were used as residences, some as pigeon roosts.

John Peters and Hermann Thiersch were the first biblical archeologists to recognize the site as ancient Maresha while on a tour of the Holy Land in 1902. However, they were initially skeptical when their guide led them to "an insignificant looking hole in the ground" near Tell Sandahannah. As their journal shows:

"We had been so often deceived, and induced to descend with exalted expectations into holes that proved to contain nothing of interest, that it was with some hesitation, the hour being then quite late, and only on our guide's reiterated assurances of the real importance of this hole, that one of us descended into it. It proved to be the most remarkable tomb ever discovered in Palestine."

The Romans also built in the region, and a rare amphitheatre with a 5,000-person capacity was discovered here in 1980. The road back to Jerusalem follows much the same path that Roman engineers laid out for it 2,000 years ago. As you follow it on your return to Jerusalem, watch for exposed cuts of the ancient Roman road.

The Supreme Court building in Jerusalem has a unique architectural character which attempts to evoke biblical images found in traditional Jewish writings. [WZPS photo by Sammy Avnisan]

Israel's 'jewel in the crown'

By RUTH HEIGES
Special to The CJN

For decades. Israel's Supreme Court justices had no choice but to ignore the drab and chilly rented quarters over which they presided in central Jerusalem's Russian Compound. So limited were these facilities that for high profile cases such as the Eichmann trial, courtrooms had to be improvised in the Jerusalem Convention Centre.

Since November 1992. however, the country's highest court has been housed in a building appropriate to its dignity and importance. While the executive and legislative branches usually draw more attention, Israel's judiciary is seen by many to be the most sparkling "jewel in the crown" of democratic rule. In similar metaphor, the magnificent new Supreme Court building dominates the government precinct near the western entrance to Jerusalem, overlooking both the Prime Minister's Office, in one direction, and the Knesset in the other.

Awe-inspiring in its design and richly filled with symbolism, the construction of the building was made possible by the estate of the late James A. de Rothschild, who in 1957 also endorsed the construction of the Knesset building. An international competition, in which 174 prominent architects took part, was conducted for the design of the building. So serious was the quest for the design that even the proposed models served as the focus of museum exhibits viewed by the Israeli public. Ultimately, the concept proposed by an Israeli architectural firm, the brother and sister team of Ram Karmi and Ada Karmi-Melamede, was selected. Even then, however, their fundamental design underwent 16 changes before the form was finalized.

The result is a structure which is simultaneously accessible and awesome. Sunlight reflects off the imposing marble facade, penetrating great arched windows, glass walls and skylights to bathe the warm wooden marble interior. From within, those same windows, which echo the ancient architecture of the city, frame the living panoramas of Jerusalem in each direction.

The psalmist wrote, "He will lead me in the circles of justice..." (Psalms 23:3), so circles and curves are used to express justice. Law and truth are represented through straight lines and direct paths between points. This begins with the main entrance to the building, to where the staircase is reminiscent of a classic Jerusalem passageway, continuing at the opposite end, in a straight pathway to the Knesset.

The straight, rising lines of a pyramid form the main entrance hall of the building, with the three-level law library visible through the glass walls of the pyramid. From here, the building is divided into distinctive and separate wings for the public, administration and the courtrooms themselves.

"The path leading to the public dimension is often strewn with surprises," the architects explain. "For example, although the public level had been totally transformed from the original design, footsteps still fade away and vanish, as in the large foyer (Salle des Pas Perdues) of the Supreme Court building of Paris."

This is also evidenced in the airy foyer, which leads into the courtroom wing. To dignify the old heritage of the people as well as the modern state, one wall is made of modern white stone, evoking the Mediterranean shore, while the other is of natural stone, reminiscent of Jerusalem's historical building style.

Repeating the concept of ancient courts at the city gates, the entrance to each of the five courtrooms evokes a gate. While the public enters directly into these rooms, prisoners are brought up from a lower level, and the justices descend from a higher one.

The design of the courtrooms accommodates the functions of Israel's unique higher court, for the Supreme Court also sits as the High Court of Justice. In such cases, the Supreme Court acts as a court of first and last instance, exercising judicial review over the other branches of government or asserting its powers "in matters in which it considers it necessary to grant relief in the interests of justice and which are not within the jurisdiction of any other court or tribunal."

Such cases often pertain to challenges of government actions and issues of human rights. It is this function as the High Court of Justice, combined with the fact that all Israeli judges are professionals who have proven their worthiness of such responsibilities, that has drawn world approval and admiration of Israel's judicial system.

Since juries are not used, the judges bear total responsibility and authority for the process. Of the 14 justices who serve on the Supreme Court at one time, as many as 11 might be impaneled when sitting as the High Court of Justice on major cases. As the design of the largest courtroom properly accommodates the justices, the imposing effect of the courtroom further dignifies the gravity of these procedures.

The straight walkway to the Knesset, which passes through the beautiful Wohl Rose Garden, provides another opportunity to appreciate the facets and angles of the building, enhanced all the more by the aesthetic setting.

"All our senses came into play," note the architects, "as we attempted to measure those elements which can be measured, to sense that which can be felt, to love that which can be loved and, finally, to behold that which can be seen."

Haifa-area Druze families welcome visitors into homes

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The town of Isfiya in Israel's Carmel' Mountains is so close to Haifa as to be considered almost a suburb. Yet it is markedly different.

Built on the site of an ancient Jewish village, Isfiya is a Druze village, and most of its 9,000 inhabitants are followers of the secretive mystical religion that was founded 1,001 years ago in the year 996. The Druze are instantly recognizable on the streets of Isfiya, the male elders because of their thick mustaches, dark robes and Fez-style hats; the women due to their traditional embroidered dress.

One of 22 Druze villages in Israel, Isfiya has opened some of its homes to outsiders. By pre-arrangement, groups of visitors may come into the dining room of a Druze family home, eat a traditional Druze meal, and afterwards learn something about Druze traditions and beliefs.

The Druze have no territorial aspirations of their own, and the 90,000 or so living in Israel fully accept and support the existence of the Jewish state. Since 1956, their youth have been obliged, like all Israelis, to serve in the army. In many respects, the Druze and the Jews have provided an exemplary model of co-existence.

The main prophet of the Druze is Jethro, the father-in-law of the biblical Moses, whom they call Nabi-Shoab. Their holy books, called Wisdom Books, are not available in any library or bookstore; they are secret texts that may be seen and studied only by religious members of the tribe.

And it is a tribe. Since the year 1043, no newcomers have been admitted into the religion. The only way to become a Druze is through birth. (There are presently about 1.5 million Druze in the world, principally in Lebanon and Syria, with about 200,000 scattered throughout Latin America.)

The Druze do not drink, smoke, use drugs or eat pork, and those who marry outside the tribe are excommunicated. The Druze place of worship is called the khailwa and resembles an ordinary house; it is never marked by any sign or emblem to distinguish it to outsiders. The Druze have kept a low profile and remained secretive over the centuries as a result of the persecution they suffered in the Middle Ages from Muslim governors who did not recognize their religion. For similar reasons, Druze villages are always located on remote mountaintops, not on open plains or by the sea, where there would be less protection.

Jaber Aburukun, a Druze schoolteacher in Isfiya, addressed our group as we ate lunch, eloquently outlining many of the details of his religion. As Aburukun explained, the Druze are strongly monotheistic and believe fervently in reincarnation. Although they bury their dead, they do not consider the graves of their ancestors as sacred, and eventually re-use all cemetery plots.

"We do not believe in resurrection," said Aburukun. "We believe that the human being comes back to life as spirit. Not the bones! Only the spirit! So I believe that my grandfather lies not in the grave — he lives again as a young person. We're not afraid of death, since we believe we're going to live again."

As the schoolteacher explained, he and his coreligionists believe there is no heaven or hell, and that the soul of a dying person does not linger in purgatory but proceeds almost immediately after death into a newborn or soon-to-be-born baby.

A cousin of Aburukun's, a Druze soldier serving in the Israeli military, was killed while on duty in an explosion in 1983, he said. A child born later in a neighboring Druze village supposedly told his parents, at the age of three or four, that he had another family in a previous life, and accurately described many details of the family of the slain soldier.

"The child knew every member of the family and could describe all the details about living with them," said Aburukun, who frequently asks children in his class if they remember anything about their past lives.

For the Druze of Isfiya, welcoming visitors into their homes allows them to share in the windfall of tourist dollars that is increasingly flowing into Israel. For visitors, it's a way to learn about an intriguing religious minority that has co-existed in harmony with the Jews for centuries. To arrange a group visit to a Druze home, ask your travel agent to contact the Haifa Tourist Board.

Blackout in Jerusalem, 1967

By ABRAHAM RABINOVICH
The Jerusalem Post

A banshee wail startled me out of a deep sleep and it took several seconds before I registered that I was lying on a grassy slope, that I was in Jerusalem and that there was a war on.

It was mid-morning, Wednesday, June 7, 1967, two days into the Six Day War. I had arrived from the United States a week before to cover the crisis for an American newspaper. Since the shooting began, I had been spending most of my time in border neighborhoods absorbing the awesome sights and sounds of war. I could see the impact of shells in that virtual Jerusalem, at once tangible and unreal, just across the way. In a strange acoustical phenomenon, the sound of explosions reverberated around the hills, seeming to roll round and round and grow louder and louder until they died in a climactic thunderclap.

At night, a huge projector beam from the roof of the Histadrut building on Straus Street periodically swept across the landscape, pinpointing targets for artillery spotters. At first there would be only brief spurts of light, but when Jordanian artillery failed to fire at the projector, it would hold a target for long minutes. The white cone seemed like a theatrical spotlight on an enormous opera stage. Sometimes, when something erupted in its centre, it was like a divine finger of retribution.

The war had its own rhythm. The noise of explosions and gunfire was deafening. But often the city was still enough to hear the distant barking of a dog or the sound of an electric transformer that one would ordinarily not hear on the street. Jerusalem has never been as silent as it was during these battle lulls.

At night, darkness was virtually total. Emerging from the blacked-out premises of the Jerusalem Post, then off Zion Square, where I had been given access to a typewriter, I had to feel my way with hands and toes in order to reach the censor's office in the Russian Compound two blocks away. From there, I would feel my way to the telex office in the main post office to send my stories abroad.

The streets seemed totally empty.

Residents of the border areas were trapped in their homes for the two days of the battle, sometimes less than 100 metres from Jordanian positions. The Jordanians maintained heavy artillery and mortar fire on the border area to break up any Israeli attack that might be forming. (Mortars would inflict heavy casualties on a paratroop battalion waiting in the alleys of the Beit Yisrael quarter to cross no-man's-land opposite the American Colony Hotel.)

Border residents, mostly at the lower end of the socio-economic scale, bore their fate with remarkable fortitude. Virtually all young and middle-aged men had been mobilized, leaving womenfolk, children and the elderly. The din of battle was all around them and it did not take an overactive mind to imagine Arab soldiers bursting through the door. I visited many of these houses and nowhere encountered panic. The residents assembled on the ground floor of their buildings as instructed by civil defence wardens before the war and formed a commune for the duration, cooking together and sharing care of the children. In one basement, I found the residents sitting in a circle, most with children on their laps, taking turns telling stories.

At about 3 a.m. on the first night, I was on Shivtei Yisrael Street when a heavy barrage suddenly began to descend. Colonel Mordechai Gur's paratroop brigade had begun its attack on the northern end of the Jordanian line between the American Colony Hotel and Ammunition Hill, and the Jordanians were shelling with everything they had all along the border.

Shaken by the intensity of the blasts, I ducked into a building and found an empty lobby which had too many windows to offer a sense of security. Hearing voices behind a door I knocked and was invited in. The room was totally dark but hands guided me to a place where I could sit. They had gathered there, a voice said, because it was an inside room with no windows. Someone said they numbered nine, but I could not see anyone. I could hear children, but all the voices were calm.

The room was stifling hot. They sat in darkness, a voice explained, because the electricity was off and candles would raise the temperature. Someone offered me water. I never saw the people I spent that hour with. When I emerged from the building, dawn was beginning to light the sky.

From a balcony in Musrara on the second night of the war, I could hear a great rumbling sound from beyond the Mount of Olives where the air force was attacking a Jordanian tank column. Fire raged through part of Augusta Victoria on the Mount of Olives and through a

I had snatched only a few hours of sleep during the two days and I was exhausted. Passing through Independence Park, I lay down and promptly fell asleep. The Jordanian shelling had stopped, but the overhead wail woke me after only a short nap. The sound was traveling from north to south but there was no plane visible. I would later be told that it was a new type of mortar shell being used to support the Jerusalem Brigade as it prepared to move south to conquer the Hebron hills.

With the adrenaline pumping once more, I stopped in at the Post where I found Charlie Weiss, the chief copy editor, alone in the newsroom. He said that Israeli troops were reported to have captured the Old City. I suggested we try to get over. We walked to the Mandelbaum Gate crossing point, used by diplomats and pilgrims, hoping to talk our way through the border guards. To our astonishment, the border checkpost was empty.

Approaching Lions' Gate, we passed a smoldering bus and then stepped over the wooden gate itself, which had been felled by paratroop commander Motta Gur's halftrack only four hours before, when he smashed into the walled city. When we reached the Temple Mount, Weiss continued on to the Western Wall, but I decided to linger on the mount.

The scene was monumental. Long lines of Arabs, hands raised, were silhouetted against the sky as they moved across the platform of the Dome of the Rock guarded by helmeted paratroopers cradling Uzis. The prisoners, all in civilian clothing, were ordered to kneel in a line facing a stone wall. They were told to keep hands on their heads until they were called for interrogation. Some were older men, but young men with military bearing could be seen stiff-backed among the rest. The Jordanian soldiers who had remained in the Old City the night before had swapped their uniforms for civilian clothing.

Display of might

A swarthy sergeant-major commanding the guard detail cautioned his men. "They're prisoners but they're also human beings."

The Arabs seemed stunned by the display of might casually bristling about them. Most Jordanians had believed that the Jordanian army would be in Tel Aviv within two days. The debacle was as incomprehensible to them as it was humiliating.

One of the prisoners slumped against a tree with his eyes closed as if hoping the scene would disappear when he opened them. As a plane roared overhead, tears began to flow through his closed lids and his hands trembled.

"They're afraid," a young soldier watching alongside me said, "but we won't harm them."

The paratroopers were bronzed and unshaven and many wore captured Arab kaffiyehs on their heads or around their necks. A group of officers surrounded by the antennae of their radio men watched planes circling beyond the Mount of Olives and darting down above the Jericho road. The compound was filling with supply vehicles, including a mobilized Tnuva milk truck laden with military equipment. Some soldiers climbed into the cabs of the vehicles to sleep. Across the mount a cheer went up from soldiers gathered around an officer who had just finished addressing them.

Despite the bewildering speed of events, the soldiers had obviously given thought to the political implications of the battle. Some said Israel must keep all or part of the territory captured on other fronts. Only one advocated returning everything, including Jerusalem. In this offhand discussion on the Temple Mount before the last shots were fired, all the major positions that would occupy the Israeli political scene in the ensuing three decades were outlined.

The sun was already low when I left the emotion-drenched alleys in front of the Western Wall and headed out of the Old City through Dung Gate, attaching myself to a platoon of Jerusalem Brigade snipers. The village of Silwan across the valley had not yet been combed and the platoon commander ordered his men to keep their eyes on its windows.

The stone houses, all of them flying white flags, seemed to meld into the hillside in the incredibly golden light. Beyond was the great purple cleft of the Jordan Valley. As we climbed the rear slope of Mount Zion, we passed groups of soldiers crowded around transistor radios. Cheers marked announcements of the war's progress.

Soldiers of the Southern Command were already at the Suez Canal and armored units had reached the Jordan River at Jericho. One company sat in a circle singing chassidic songs. At the top of the hill, the Israeli side of the city came into view. It was almost dark now and for the first time since the war began, the lights were on in Jerusalem.

NOTES FROM THE GALILEE, HAIFA & JAFFA

A Galilean Guest House: Established almost 40 years in the Galilee, the Amirim "moshav" offers visitors an attractive alternative to city hotels in Tzfat or Tiberius.

Amirim is a rural community of about 350 people, set in rolling green hills and brimming with flowering plants. Its residents have been welcoming overnight visitors since tourism took off in Israel in the late 1960s.

Amirim boasts about 90 guest houses and rooms, which are let by travellers eager to fill their eyes with panoramic views of the Sea of Galilee and their lungs with the region's famous fresh air.

They live in a modern religious fashion and make no religious requests of visitors, but their synagogue is usually well-attended on Saturdays and holidays.

What is there to do at Amirim? Guest house operator Sarah Peleg takes only a moment to consider. "Most people just stay in the yard and look at the flowers," she replies.

However, she points out that Amirim's homes and cottages are within half an hour's driving distance of Tiberius and the Lake of Galilee, 20 minutes to Tzfat or Peke'en, and 15 minutes to Carmiel. In short, it is ideally situated as a base from which to explore the Galilee.

During high season in July and August, most visitors book for several days and no single-night bookings are accepted. Rates are roughly 220 NIS or $110 per room.

* * *

The Port City of Haifa: Israel's third-largest city, Haifa, ranks fifth as a tourism destination within Israel. On Thursdays, when the weather is nice, you are almost sure to see a bridal party as you walk along the lovely Bat Gallim Promenade, a favorite spot with locals. The nearby Clandestine Immigration & Navy Museum details the attempts of Zionists to reach land in the British Mandate era.

Near the base of the cable car are two more sites worth visiting.

One is the National Maritime Museum that traces the sea-faring history of the Mediterranean, the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean since ancient times.

Items on display include the battering ram of a Phoenician ship of the fourth century BCE, and three funerary barques built by Egyptians and Phoenicians in the 20th century BCE.

The museum, at 198 Allenby Rd., also features a collection of old navigational maps and engravings. (The museum was founded in 1953 by Arieh Ben Eli, since deceased, whose daughter Ruthi is married to my brother, Howard Gladstone of Toronto.)

Set into the hill across the street is Elijah's cave, an important religious historical site. Tradition asserts that this cave sheltered the biblical prophet Elijah and other holy people. It now draws pilgrims of all three faiths.

A Renovated Caravanserai in Jaffa: A picturesque port city south of Tel Aviv, Jaffa offers an assortment of boutiques, crafts shops, restaurants and markets.

A building that was constructed as a Turkish caravanserai about 1740, and which later become the city's first Jewish khan or inn, has recently undergone a massive three-year renovation at a cost of NIS 4 million (about $2 million). Now it is the private Ilana Goor Museum and is worth visiting both to experience the architecture and to see the art collection within.

Ilana Goor, a well-known Israeli artist, filled these atmospheric rooms with gorgeous old rugs, chairs, tables and other antiques and statuary. Her own art, featuring vibrant designs and reflecting a sensibility both old and new, is for sale in the gift shop.

Part of the building was once a house of prayer known as the Libya Synagogue. Admission is 15 NIS (10 NIS for groups). 4 Mazal Dagim St., Old Jaffa. 972-3-6837676.

Guide books to Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Middle East, given its fascinating history as a cradle of civilizations, has always been high on a list of travel destinations.

If you're thinking of venturing there, prepare yourself by consulting a few good guidebooks. The ones that have crossed my desk of late are published by Lonely Planet in London and distributed by Raincoast Books in Vancouver.

Middle East on a Shoestring ($31.50), compiled by a team of knowledgeable writers, is exactly what you should read before setting off on your trip. It is comprehensive as well as practical, containing maps and a wealth of information about Israel, the territories, the Arab world, Turkey, Iran and Afghanistan. It should be of particular use to travellers on a tight budget.

If you plan to spend more than a day in Jerusalem, Andrew Humphreys' pocket-size guide, Jerusalem ($18.50), will be of more than passing interest. The author delves into the city's historic, cultural, religious, political, archeological and culinary dimensions. He also provides suggestions for side excursions to the Dead Sea, Jericho and Bethlehem.

Since Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, a tidal wave of Israelis and Jews from the Diaspora have descended on the Hashemite kingdom, revelling in such sights as Petra, Mount Nebo and Wadi Rum. Readers who still haven't been there should immerse themselves in Jordan & Syria ($25.50). Beware, however, that a Syrian visa is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain if you're Jewish.

Sensitive play doesn't quite hang together

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —An extraordinary sensitivity to Jewish mores, but a plot that doesn't hang together, are elements of Bitter Apples, by Victoria Keidan of Alliston, winner of the playwriting contest sponsored by the Jewish theatre committee of UJA Federation.

Despite impressive acting by the cast, a staged reading of the full-length play at the Bloor JCC failed to overcome the fact that the main-spring actions do not ring true in today's world.

Keidan, herself a Jew, had laudable aims in trying to show that three generations of women, including a rebellious teenager, have different attachments to Judaism.

But fastening the plot to the refusal of the teenager to have her head shaved because she kicked her rabbi in the shin, is the tactic of an agitprop play.

A first act, which ran much too long and contained arguments already made, did not help.

Nevertheless, Keidan has a keen ear for dialogue when she has one of the characters say: "You are telling a Jewish mother not to be suspicious," and when the mother tells her 16-year-old rebel, "I don't care what they call it, just don't do it."

As the mute grandmother who terrorizes the household with her love for chocolates and French magazines, Patricia Carrol Brown is outstanding, her physical gestures speaking volumes without uttering a sound.

As Maxine, the rebel, Judy Reynolds gave a professional reading to the role. As the mother, Edie Goldstein, and Jennifer Doyle as the older sister, were both competent. Bitter Apples was directed by Kevin Sheard.

"Each contest has attracted entries from all across the country, sure proof of the vitality of Jewish creativity in Canada," he said.

"The committee's dream is to promote full commercially viable productions that our winners and runners-up so richly deserve."

'Images of war' haunted author of Fugitive Pieces

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — It's not easy to reach Anne Michaels this year. The Toronto poet turned novelist, whose book, Fugitive Pieces, is on best-seller lists around the world, has spent a large part of the year promoting the book overseas.

Recently, however, she agreed to a phone interview during a 10-day respite in her travelling.

Soft spoken, polite and happy to discuss her work, she shied away from any questions relating to her personal life. Asked what in her experience had led her to such intimate portrayals of the effects of the Holocaust on the novel's two main characters, a child survivor and a child of survivors, she replied enigmatically, "The war was in the house. I was aware of it from very early on."

Like her characters, whose lives are shaped by events they didn't experience personally, Michaels was profoundly affected by the Holocaust.

"Images of the war haunted me. There was such a deep incomprehension of what I was looking at. There were basic philosophic questions that I couldn't, as a human being, ask myself or not try and answer."

The decision to write her first novel was a long time coming.

The process, once started, Michaels said, was long and painful. Researching the war material was "agonizing" and she found herself needing to put the book aside a number of times during the 10 years it took to write. Entering into the pain of her characters' experiences, she was never quite certain where it would lead.

"When I started writing this book, I had a very strong intuition that the ending could be the ending that's there, but I was determined to write my way through, in order to prove that any kind of faith was still a possibility. I would have to say that certainly for two-thirds of the writing I really despaired."

The rewards have been plentiful. Fugitive Pieces has made the short list of a number of prestigious awards, including Canada's Giller Prize and the British Commonwealth's Orange Prize. It has been number one on the Globe and Mail's bestsellers list.

One of the most gratifying experiences for Michaels in the last year has been the book's reception by people of all ages and backgrounds. In Germany when the book came out, she was impressed and moved by the depth of emotion and thought behind the questions she was asked.

"I think that in Germany the union of feeling with all of that intellectual activity is extremely important. If the images are powerful enough to penetrate the reader, to get past the defence, hopefully people will not only feel the images, but also think about what they mean."

She has also been pleasantly surprised by the number of younger readers who are connecting to the book. A woman approached her after a reading, saying she had read the book after her son recommended it to her. When she expressed her reluctance to read a book that might be too painful, he replied, "No, Mom, not at all. It's all about love."

Michaels was delighted. "To hear that from a 17-year-old reader was a tremendous gift to me, because I don't think that summary simplifies the book. To say 'it's all about love' retains the complexity pretty well."

Symposium examines treatment of osteoporosis

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Exercise, proper diet and hormone replacement therapy can overcome the ravages of osteoporosis, a disease that affects one in four Canadian women – some 1.4 million.

This was the message given at a recent all-day symposium on osteoporosis, the seventh Mount Sinai Hospital Auxiliary symposium on women and health, held at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts.

Over 300 men and women attended the event, which included lectures, panel discussions, cooking and exercise demonstrations, and exhibits.

Keynote speaker Dr. Ethel Silverman Siris, professor of clinical medicine at Columbia University in New York and director of the Toni Stabile Osteoporosis Prevention and Treatment Centre at Columbia Presbyterian Medical Centre, said that most damage from osteoporosis occurs after menopause.

"If a woman goes through menopause at age 50, she will probably live until 80 – and that means for one-third of her life she will be at increased risk."

Osteoporosis, she said, is "the systemic, skeletal disease characterized by low bone mass and microarchitectural deterioration of bone tissue, with subsequent increase in bone fragility and susceptibility to fracture."

Thus, not only is there lower bone density, but the structure of the bone itself is altered.

Low bone mass, she warned, "is the single most accurate predictor of increased fracture risk."

Fractures of the wrist, she said, may not be life threatening, but may lead to stiffness, osteoarthritis and some loss of function. Damage to the spine can cause loss of height and deformity (the so-called dowager's hump) and pain.

This deformity, she said, can lead to a loss of self-esteem, as well. "You can't find proper clothes, you get depressed, have difficulty walking, and suffer from constipation and bloating."

But the most serious danger is fracture of the hip. "About 50 percent never fully recover from that, and there is up to 20 percent excess mortality within the first year after a hip fracture."

While the single major factor in bone mass is genetic, Siris said, exercise is especially useful in bone building. In old age, she said, exercise strengthens muscles, which may prevent falls.

After menopause, when the ovaries stop producing estrogen, there is accelerated bone loss, especially in the immediate post menopausal years.

Current medical practice, she said, focuses on trying to prevent osteoporosis. "We especially target women who already have low bone mass."

Other risk factors for osteoporosis, she said, include early menopause, Caucasian or Asian race, sedentary lifestyle, smoking, excessive alcohol and caffeine intake, and certain drugs.

A diet high in calcium, including dairy products, sardines, certain vegetables, together with calcium supplements is important, as is vitamin D.

Siris is a firm believer in hormone replacement therapy as a prevention of osteoporosis.

"Not only does it help prevent osteoporosis, but it appears to lower the risk of both heart disease and Alzheimer's disease.

While there are some problems with estrogen therapy, she said, such as weight gain, the possible resumption of menstrual periods and a concern about susceptibility to uterine and breast cancer, the current feeling, she said is that "you have to balance those problems against the much more real risk of heart disease."

Osteoporosis, she concluded, is a serious medical problem, often with no symptoms until a fracture occurs. Early diagnosis and treatment is essential.

Michael Devlin, assistant professor in the division of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and program director of the residency training program in the division of physiatry, department of rehabilitation medicine at the U of T, said that exercise improves balance and prevents falls.

Weight bearing exercise is especially good, he said, such as walking, stair climbing, and jumping on and off a one-foot platform.

Other participants in the symposium were Dr. Gillian Hawker, research director, multidisciplinary osteoporosis program, Women's College Hospital; Gail Lemieux, of the Osteoporosis Society of Canada; dietician Marsha Rosen; Dr. Marla Shapiro, of Mount Sinai, North York General and Toronto hospitals; home economist Jan Main; and physical therapist Josie Tominac, coordinator of the prevention and rehabilitation of osteoporosis program at the Queen Elizabeth Hospital.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs which relate to the theme celebrating 100 years of Zionism. They must be original photos "shot" by the reader.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Canuck runs skating program at Israeli ice palace

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Well, it's happened.

After being exposed to on-ice activities, watching games on satellite TV and anticipating a pro-run summer camp, kids in Israel are going hockey crazy. Some of them can't get enough of the sport.

"I've gotten calls from teachers and parents saying that the kids only want to play hockey," said Jeff Budd, head of hockey instructors at the Canada Centre recreational complex in Metulla. "A lot of the kids are getting hockey sickness."

This is the summer that could cure, or perhaps deepen, the kids' addiction to Canada's winter sport. Not only will Metulla host the Maccabiah Games' first-ever hockey tournament in July, but later in the summer, the Canada Centre ice palace will serve as the venue for a hockey school led by St. Louis Blues' assistant coach Roger Neilson.

The kids in Metulla are going ga-ga over the prospect of attending a hockey camp, said Budd. "They can't believe it's happening."

Budd too must be pinching himself to determine whether his good fortune is really happening. As hockey coach and volunteer coordinator at Canada Centre, Budd can't believe he's landed a job that allows him to teach and play hockey while living in the Holy Land. He's been at it for four years and "I never expected it to last this long."

During a two-week visit to Canada recently, the Kitchener-Waterloo native said "it was just one of those things. You get attached to the kids. It's a great little job I've got going there."

Budd parlayed a volunteer position helping Metulla get a youth hockey program off the ground into a full time job. During the winter, he's in charge of four volunteers and in the summer that number expands to seven.

In addition to Budd, Torontonians Rob Wise, Jordan Grossman, Hartley Springman and Zac Shnier, all Forest Hills Collegiate grads, ran the skating and hockey programs at the centre this past winter/spring.

They supervise recreational skating programs at the centre's two rinks, as well as skating classes for children in grades 4 and 5 from nearby schools. Skating has become part of the regular gym programs at seven area schools, Budd says.

Budd is also in charge of a hockey program for about 50 young people, who come to the rink three times a week. The rinks serve Metulla and surrounding, northern Israeli communities. Some kids come for hockey and skating from as far as the Golan Heights, about an hour away.

Participants are divided among three teams, depending on age. Older players and volunteers play on Metulla's entry in the Israeli national league.

Older kids and volunteers practise and scrimmage once or twice a week and play friendly games versus Canadian peacekeepers stationed in the Golan Heights.

During his four-year stint in Metulla, Budd has watched the calibre of Israeli hockey improve

Some of that is attributable to the influx of players from the former Soviet Union, like Max Birbrauer and Sergei Ostrovski. Ran Oz, a hulking defenceman who played one year with the Toronto Midget Marlies, is a sabra skater. The Guelph Storm of the Ontario Hockey League showed an interest in Oz, but he decided instead to perform his army service. Oz is a member of Israel's national team.

Like Oz, there are a lot of young Israelis who love the sport. "Every kid who sees it, loves it," he says.

Jerusalem compromise possible: survey

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A survey on Palestinian attitudes toward Jerusalem indicates that there is some basis for believing an agreement could be reached that would be acceptable to most Israelis, according to researcher Jerome Segal.

Segal's survey, conducted for the Centre for International and Security Studies at the University of Maryland in August and September 1996, was completed before the Jerusalem tunnel riots began a confrontation over Jerusalem. A companion survey on Israeli attitudes was completed just after the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

However, Segal says his findings still hold, namely that if Palestinians were to receive sovereignty over the areas of Jerusalem most important to them, which are mostly those areas least important to Israelis, agreement could be reached.

The figures, however, show the two sides are still very far from an agreement on this. In a December poll by the Nablus-based Centre for Research and Studies on the six-point "Beilin-Abu Mazen plan," Palestinian support on the Jerusalem aspect of the plan scored lowest by far.

However, at a Jerusalem press conference last week, Segal, who once produced a draft Palestinian constitution, warned of the dangers of postponing the Jerusalem issue until everything else is settled, since he said that would emphasize the religious character of the dispute over Jerusalem, which would otherwise be subsumed in the overall political solution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

"A Jerusalem-centred conflict can be more explosive than a Palestinian-Israeli conflict," he said.

With the aim of expediting an understanding on Jerusalem, Segal and his co-researcher Nader Said emphasized its more positive aspects. Among the most contentious issues – control over holy sites – the researchers found that 64 percent of Palestinians compared to 35 percent of Israelis supported the idea that sovereignty "should belong to God."

They noted that 20 percent of Palestinians and 40 percent of Israelis recognized that the other side had legitimate rights in the city, a basis from which he said it could be possible to build a majority on both sides. Both people view the Jerusalem boundaries as policy instruments rather than as sacrosanct, he noted.

The basic situation is that 67 percent of Palestinians would consider "a special arrangement" for Jewish neighborhoods established across the Green Line, while 53 percent would consider Israeli sovereignty over Jewish neighborhoods in the Old City if Palestinians got sovereignty over their Old City neighborhoods.

However, any proposal falling short of Palestinian sovereignty in a large part of Arab-populated areas seemed, on the basis of the survey, destined for collapse, with Jerusalem residents being among the most radical on this point, despite their acquisition of Israeli residency rights.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I have lived in the same apartment for the last 27 years. Six months ago, my wife was institutionalized and now, I don't have enough money to pay the rent. My income has dropped and my expenses have gone up. I have to pay for my wife's care, interest rates are down, and I don't know how to cook, so I buy prepared food. I am 86 years old and I don't have the strength to move.

Ashamed

Dear Ashamed,

These are problems common to many seniors, at this time. Cutbacks in health and social services have put more pressure on individuals. Perhaps, you should speak to your financial advisor to determine whether your investments can provide more income or whether you might have to consider using some of your capital. Also, call your local community agency to ensure that you are receiving all the benefits to which you are entitled. They might even be able to help you organize your food shopping at a lesser cost.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

GREETINGS, PILGRIM

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently received Russian Orthodox Patriarch Alexii II in Jerusalem. Patriarch Alexii is leading a group of Christian pilgrims on a tour of the country's holy sites.

Clashes continue in Hebron

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli-Palestinian tensions in Hebron remain high after more than a week of violent clashes in this West Bank town.

Israeli Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai accused the Palestinian Authority last Sunday of failing to quell last week's riots and warned that continued unrest in the West Bank and Gaza Strip would result in Palestinian casualties.

Scores of Palestinians were wounded in eight days of clashes with Israeli security forces along the boundary between the enclave of about 450 Jewish settlers and the Palestinian section of Hebron, home to some 100,000 Arabs.

Speaking during a tour of Hebron, Mordechai said the Palestinian leadership was not doing enough to calm the situation.

"Unfortunately, the Palestinian Authority is not doing what it has to do" to stop the violence, he said.

Waiting for change in Hong Kong

How the Jewish community will be affected

Much has been written and discussed in the western press about the highly anticipated hand-over of Hong Kong to China. Reports have cited China's history of repression, the proposed withdrawal of certain civil liberties in Hong Kong and the memory of Tiananmen Square.

How do Jews living in Hong Kong feel about the historic changes? How will the change in government affect their sense of security, their personal and professional status and the viability of the Jewish community?

While the presence of Jews in China dates as far back as the Silk Trade in the seventh century, the Jewish community in Hong Kong was formally established in the mid-1850s. The earliest members were mostly Sephardi Jews originally from Persia, who came via India, following the British Colonial Empire to the Far East. They were predominantly traders, merchants and financiers.

Prominent Jewish families like the Sassoons and the Kadoories have greatly contributed economically and philanthropically to both the secular and the Jewish communities of China. Their efforts have not gone unnoticed and they, as well as the Jewish community, are held in high regard by the Chinese.

Today, there is a thriving Jewish community in Hong Kong estimated at 3,000 to 4,000 people, one that is young, dynamic, well-educated and prosperous. The community supports several congregations spanning the complete range of religious affiliation, from Orthodox Sephardi and Ashkenazi to Reform, as well as a rich communal Jewish life. The community, originating from over 25 different countries, is a microcosm of any Jewish community around the world facing similar problems and challenges.

EGYPTIAN THREATS NOT TAKEN SERIOUSLY

Reports from London that Egypt's President Anwar Sadat is contemplating a surprise strike against Israel are not taken seriously in informed circles in Jerusalem.

Moshe Dayan's recent suggestion that Israel should think in terms of a 10 or 15-year occupation of Sinai is considered more realistic.

The most sober Israeli estimate is that Sadat is in absolutely no position to launch any kind of operation against Israel without risking a conflagration which he would be in no position to control.

TEACHERS AWAIT JUDGMENT ON ARBITRATION

An arbitration hearing under the direction of the department of labor proceeded into second-stage meetings in a dispute between a teacher of the United Talmud Torah of Montreal and the administration of the school last week.

The negotiations — the first ever requested by the Jewish Teacher's Federation — were arranged because the school administration reduced the number of weekly working hours of Hanah Rakovski, a first-year teacher, from 18½ hours to six hours a week.

Toronto community unites for celebrations

Tributes to Israel's 50th anniversary planned

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Student Intern

TORONTO — To mark Israel's 50th anniversary, Toronto's Jewish community is planning a unique year-long celebration, starting with an opening ceremony in December 1997.

More Toronto Jewish groups than ever before will be joining together to celebrate Israel's 50th Yom Ha'atzmaut. Representatives from nearly 100 community organizations gathered last week at the Inn on the Park Hotel in North York to plan the celebration.

Earlier this year, Israel Consul General Jehudi Kinar had asked the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to coordinate community celebrations. The meeting last week was the first step in the process.

At the meeting, part of Kinar's message was that smaller communities must be included.

Joseph Steiner, president of UJA Federation, announced that special funds from the federation's continuity initiative have been made available for the celebrations. The continuity action committee is looking for innovative proposals for programs or events that reflect the Diaspora/Israel connection in the context of the 50th anniversary.

Jehudi Kinar

The funds are "part of an ongoing series of grants to enhance Jewish education, culture or heritage," said Howard English, director of communication at UJA Federation.

Any Toronto Jewish organization can apply for a continuity grant, English said, but the total amount available has yet to be determined.

UJA Federation hopes to raise half a million dollars in sponsorship to finance Toronto's Israel at 50 celebration, he said.

Bryan Keshen, director of the coordinating body of Israel at 50 estimates that between 400 and 600 organizations will participate in the festivities.

A steering committee of approximately 30 members will approve certain policies, events and dates.

The anniversary celebrations will go beyond the traditional focus of arts and culture, Keshen said. "We're going to have events that profile Israel as a technological centre. We're going to profile Israeli businesses, that sort of [thing] that has never really been as much a part of the celebration," he said.

In Israel, the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations will open this year with the lighting of the first Chanukah candle at the residence of Israeli President Ezer Weizman. The festivities will continue until Chanukah '98.

One of the highlights will take place on April 30, 1998, erev Yom Ha'atzmaut, when approximately 50,000 people will gather at the Ramat Gan stadium to see a production highlighting the major accomplishments of the state.

Torontonians will have the opportunity to watch this production by satellite hook-up at the Toronto Convention Centre.

Local celebrations will include the Kibbutz Dance Company performing at Harbourfront in March and a march for Israel from City Hall to Ontario Place in May.

Representatives of organizations such as B'nai Brith Canada, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, and ORT Canada told The CJN about their plans for the celebration.

B'nai Brith Canada, a member of the anniversary's steering committee, will be co-coordinating and sponsoring a mission to Israel, a Jerusalem Pavilion and lodge programs including Israeli entertainment and lectures.

The Canadian mission to Israel will coincide with the B'nai Brith International Convention in Israel from Aug. 23 to 27, 1998.

"We hope to celebrate. We hope to educate. We want to showcase Israel not only to the Jewish community but [to] the total Toronto community," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

ORT Canada will also be celebrating their 50th anniversary next year. They hope to bring together all ORT alumni living in the Toronto area to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary.

The Canadian Society For Yad Vashem will be joining UJA Federation to commemorate Yom Hashoah (Holocaust Remembrance Day) in 1998.

Julia Koschitzky, chair of Israel at 50, said the anniversary celebration sends a message that without Israel, there cannot be Jewish continuity.

"Jewish life can't be sustained for very long without Israel at its core. What we have to do in this anniversary is to engage young people who take Israel for granted, who don't have a memory of what it's like to be homeless and helpless and weak," she said.

"There will be 400 different activities. The whole community will be buzzing with sounds and songs and themes of Israel," she said.

Politicians failing in fight against cynicism

Jewish wisdom literature offers a rich library of writings by our sages exhorting us to seek and to actively promote the welfare of the community.

The pages of the Talmud record scores of axiomatic expressions and statements from among the discussions and the debates of the rabbis urging the people to "get involved," as it were. For example:

"Do not separate yourself from the community." (Avot)

"Activity on behalf of the community is as meritorious as studying Torah." (Brachot)

The point of the latter aphorism is not to promote communal activity as a substitute for study, but rather to forcefully make the point that communal activity is held in very high regard.

This should come as no surprise.

The essence of Mosaic law, infused at its very core with the notion that all humanity reflects the image of God, can be found in its overarching belief in the sanctity of human life.

The protection and the betterment of human life therefore lie close to the heart of what Judaism considers to be most significant on earth.

It is not too removed a leap of logic, therefore, to suggest that Jewish values encourage, or at least are highly supportive of, the pursuit of public office as a line of work. That assumes, of course, one goes into that line of work for the right reasons, namely, out of concern for the community and not out of concern for self.

Bearing in mind the importance of the work, it is deeply regrettable and even harmful to our society in the long run, that the public little respects the people who go into that line of work: our politicians.

But for the most part, they bring this contempt down on themselves.

During the past week, we saw a number of examples at the local, national and international level, poignantly illustrating why this is so.

In Toronto, the Legislative Assembly at Queen's Park came to a raucous and anger-laden standstill as a result of the boiled-over frustration felt by the Opposition and also by visitors in the public gallery in response to initiatives proposed by the Harris government that would severely curtail the nature of debate in the assembly.

The proposed changes came at a time when Opposition members still felt "cheated" by the government's unprecedented decision to keep the Assembly open on the day of the federal election thereby forcing members to be away from the chamber in order to vote in their home ridings. And when most of the Opposition members were voting in their home ridings, and thus absent from Queen's Park on June 2, the government passed its new rent control measures.

In Quebec City, Premier Lucien Bouchard told a press conference that the Parti Québécois will spend the coming months defining the kind of partnership a secessionist Quebec will negotiate with the rest of Canada.

He emphasizes and re-emphasizes the viability of partnership in order to lure the so-called "soft" federalists. But he knows fully well, that the possibility of "partnership" has already been rejected by the other premiers. It is a non-starter.

At the same time as he craftily cultivates the soft federalists, he is careful not to alienate the died-in-the-pure-wool separatists. He reassured them of his intention to hold yet another, the third, referendum.

In Ottawa, we saw the "tail-between-the-leg" spectacle of the leader of the Opposition, Preston Manning, reversing his previous well-publicized and well-televised statement spurning the official Opposition residence at Stornoway.

No one begrudges Manning any entitlement of living in the Official Opposition residence. It is a home worthy of the responsibility and of the dignity of the role of Opposition leader, a role which is so vital to the parliamentary system by which we are governed.

But what one does begrudge the newly elected leader is the deliberately overstated and overheated rhetoric which he flung at Canadians regarding the Stornoway residence in the first place. It was a smug, sanctimonious and supercilious sound-byte, which in the end, proved to be yet another campaign expedient without merit or substance.

In Jerusalem, we witnessed the resignation of the minister of Finance, Dan Meridor. Meridor is widely regarded as a man of high principle and integrity.

His resignation was ostensibly over a difference with the prime minister and the governor of the Bank of Israel over technical exchange rate mechanisms.

But the circumstances of the resignation were such that a majority of the public and even of the members of the governing coalition believe it was orchestrated by the prime minister as a way of settling an old political score.

A Gallup poll published in Ma'ariv last Friday showed that 63 percent of Israelis believed Meridor resigned over a political attempt to fire him.

As of this writing, there is significant doubt whether the prime minister's coalition will survive a no-confidence vote scheduled for Tuesday.

The list of former supporters and colleagues abandoning the prime minister mounts daily. Former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir has publicly condemned him.

Natan Sharansky's party has all but stepped out of the coalition. As he described it last week, they have "one foot out of the door."

Even David Levy, the foreign minister, this week spoke of a "big question mark" over the government's ability to take decisions in the diplomatic sphere.

In Israel, the sideshow of politics is a constant distraction, draining away the creativity, energy and focus that are so vital to deal with the many urgent issues of governing.

The chief obligation we place on our elected "governors" is to manage the burdens of government honestly and openly in accordance with the platform and the ideology they presented to the electorate.

Most reasonable people are prepared to concede a certain measure of flexibility to the government in implementing its platform, to allow for unforeseen developments without eliciting cries of "betrayal" or "shame."

But the next most important obligation we place upon our politicians is that they lead the fight against cynicism and against the resulting sense of defeatism and hopelessness that attach to it like green moss to damp bark.

This fight hinges not on ideology but rather on personal example and on integrity. In the long run, the outcome of this battle will have far-reaching implications for our society. The extent to which it is won will determine the extent to which succeeding generations will "get involved" and will agree that it is important not to separate from the community. MBD

Second generation protests presence of alleged Nazi

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

BURLINGTON, Ont. — Carrying placards saying "one is too many" and "kick the Nazi out," about 60 children of Holocaust survivors demonstrated outside the quiet suburban home of a former member of a Lithuanian killing squad.

As a handful of neighbors looked on and passing vehicles slowed for a look, the demonstrators called on the Canadian government to begin proceedings to remove Juozas (Joseph) Kisielaitis from Canada.

"We the children of survivors are not going to rest until Nazi war criminals are brought to justice," said Hindy Stegman, one of the event's organizers.

"We gather outraged and puzzled why these [men] remain here without prosecution," said Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. "It's an affront to the nation that [they] are allowed to live their lives as if nothing happened."

The protest was organized by Generation to Generation, a committee that meets under the auspices of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, in cooperation with Congress. It is the first in a series of protests that will be held outside the homes of alleged war criminals. A similar demonstration will be held in Toronto on July 23 outside the home of a suspected war criminal, Stegman said.

"I'm hoping it will bring to the attention of the Canadian government the fact that [Kisielaitis] is living here. They've had documentation on him and done nothing about it," she added.

According to background material distributed by the protesters, Kisielaitis served in the Lithuanian 12th Battalion during World War II. The unit was under the supervision of the SS and took part in the round up and murder of Jews, gypsies and Communists.

According to Efraim Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Jerusalem office, the 12th Battalion was a "murder squad" in which "every effort was made to involve every member in the shooting."

The unit took part in massacres of Jews at the fourth and seventh forts in Kaunas in which thousands of Jews were killed. On Oct. 6, 1941, the battalion was sent to Byelorussia where it carried out pogroms that were so brutal they shocked even the German commander. The unit murdered about 50,000 Jews in Byelorussia.

Kisielaitis moved to Canada in 1948 and obtained citizenship. He moved to the United States in 1963 where he lived until the mid-1980s. At that point, the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) began gathering documentation as part of a deportation case against him. In sworn testimony as part of a 1982 government case against another battalion member, Kisielaitis admitted serving in the 12th Battalion. He has subsequently stated he was merely a tailor sewing uniforms. He denies killing anyone and his son-in-law has said Kisielaitis never took part in atrocities.

Kisielaitis left the United States in 1985 and returned to Canada. The OSI described him as fleeing the country while his son, Richard Kisiel, told the Burlington Post earlier this year he left because of death threats.

Outside Kisielaitis' comfortable suburban home, Ronen told the protesters "we are going to rattle the perpetrators of the Holocaust out of their complacency."

Andy Reti, one of the protesters, said "we cannot [forget those] who have perished. We can't allow the perpetrators to be rewarded just because they lived a long life."

Harold Right said "I'm here to try to move the government to move as fast as possible to get these Nazi war criminals out of Canada."

"As a child of a survivor, I owe to those who were killed to be sure that these Nazis don't live out their lives in Canada without paying some price," Stegman said.

But down the street, watching the proceedings from a lawn chair, Murray Robinson had another take on the proceedings. "They should leave him alone," he said. "War is war...I think the people who are doing the picketing are trying to stir things up. It's all self-serving for publicity."

* * *

In other developments, as Canada's Supreme Court prepared to hear a case involving three alleged war criminals who are facing deportation, Ronen expressed concern over the participation on the court of Justice John Sopinka. Sopinka represented the Ukrainian Canadian Committee in hearings before the Deschenes Commission in the mid-'80s and made statements suggesting no legal action should be taken against war crimes suspects.

Ronen said he hoped Sopinka and the court would "look at whether he's able to try this case...It's not uncommon for a judge that acted for a particular client to excuse himself if there is an apparent conflict of interest."

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, said there may be a perception that Sopinka is biased in the case but "we have faith he'll make the proper decision.

CJC task force to aid survivors with Swiss funds

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —In their quest for money in Swiss bank accounts and for reparations from Germany, Holocaust survivors are being treated as "nudges" (whiners) and "meshugeners" (crazy ones), a survivor delegate has charged.

In response, a task force was set up by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, to get information quickly to the survivors.

"Survivors have not been able to find out where to go; we have to terminate this fiasco," survivor Nathan Leipciger, national chair of Congress' Holocaust remembrance committee, told the Congress executive.

The situation is "frustrating," said region chair Moshe Ronen, noting that Toronto has the largest number of survivors in Canada.

"People of that age should not be treated like that," said survivor Robert Engel, referring to the runaround that survivors are getting.

Part of the problem, the Congress executive was told, is that the United Restitution Organization in Toronto, with only a small staff, is not getting information it needs from the international office of the Material Claims Conference.

"The local office [United Restitution] is doing the best it can and giving addresses where survivors can get information," said Danny Fine, a Congress official. "It has no official role in the Swiss matter."

He said Congress has no complaint about the United Restitution Organization in Toronto but is concerned that survivors here are not getting enough information from Europe.

The task force, headed by Keith Landy, national legal counsel, will begin work immediately.

"The Congress national office should take up cudgels on this," said Landy. "It is a serious situation. Funds are to become available and we should identify the organizations with survivors in their membership – and we must look after non-member survivors too."

Speaking of survivor claims to the German government, delegate David Rotenberg said East German property holders should not be restricted to agreements made by someone else on their behalf.

The action to set up a task force followed a comprehensive report on Swiss restitution and attempts by survivors to get compensation from Germany by Joseph Turkel, co-chair, world Jewry and international affairs committee.

Some payments from the first fund set up by Swiss bankers can be expected this fall, Turkel said.

A total of $757 million (US) has been set aside as the third phase of the agreement with the German government, Turkel said, and applications will be accepted until 1999. This money is primarily for people who lived in ex-Soviet republics and so far 25,000 people have received funds.

Former Conservative leader loses battle with cancer

By JEFF ROSEN
News Editor

TORONTO – Larry Grossman, the first Jewish leader of the Progressive Conservative party of Ontario, died of cancer Sunday. He was 53.

Grossman, a so-called "red Tory," first entered the political arena in 1975 when he was elected to the Ontario Legislature as MPP for St. Andrew-St. Patrick, the riding previously held by his father Allan. Just a year later, then-premier William Davis appointed Grossman parliamentary assistant to the attorney general. Grossman entered cabinet as a full minister in 1977 as minister of consumer and commercial relations.

In various cabinet portfolios, Grossman introduced key legislative changes. In his first posting, he raised the drinking age to 19 from 18 and redesigned Ontario's condominium legislation. In 1978, he was appointed minister of industry and tourism, where he again left his own mark. He took a leading role in establishing Ontario's technology centres and initiated the Yours to Discover campaign to boost the province's tourism industry.

In 1982, Grossman was appointed minister of health and introduced compulsory immunization for children and Ontario's first paramedic program.

In 1985, Grossman threw his hat into the leadership ring after Davis stepped down, declaring that his religion would not be a factor when the party chose a new leader.

However, after the convention ballots were all counted, Grossman was 77 votes shy of a victory and Frank Miller was the new premier.

Grossman served briefly as education minister in the Miller government before the party lost power to David Peterson's Liberals in the 1985 election.

After Miller stepped down, Grossman took another stab at the party's leadership and defeated Tory rival Dennis Timbrell by 19 votes. He served as party leader for two years before his party was reduced to third party status in the 1987 vote and Grossman went down to personal defeat in his own riding.

Throughout his political life, Grossman strived to maintain his family life, taking his three children to Exhibition Stadium, where they would enjoy his other favorite passion – the Toronto Blue Jays – "like any other normal person.

"I always said that I didn't want to be one of those politicians who, when he leaves politics after losing an election, says, 'Well now I'll be able to get to know my wife and children.' If you have to say that, you shouldn't have got into it in the first place," he told The CJN in 1987.

Larry Grossman

After leaving politics, Grossman moved back into the private sector, heading the investment banking section of brokerage firm Richardson Greenshields. He became chief executive officer at Counsel Financial in 1988 and then joined the law firm of Macaulay, Chusid and Friedman.

'Sense of fulfilment'

Shortly after stepping out of the political limelight, Grossman waxed philosophical about governments and his own place in the process.

"I've learned that governments tend to overestimate the impact of those things they do and tend to underestimate the public," he said. "I have learned that the things you accomplish are often those that draw the least publicity or attention.

"I can look back and feel quite a sense of accomplishment and fulfilment. I would like to be remembered as a hardworking, compassionate minister. I loved the ministries I had and tried to use every minute I had."

How far, how deep has hatred taken root

One need not believe in the religious legitimacy of an egalitarian minyan, nor subscribe to a more "liberal" Judaism in any of its evolving manifestations to have been outraged, saddened and ultimately humiliated by what happened at the Kotel two weeks ago on Shavuot.

Standing at the back of the wide, pedestrian plaza at the Western Wall, but actually far from the Wall itself, a group of Conservative Jews – men and women – gathered together to pray.

No sooner had the group arrived, when a large number of haredi youths began to mill ominously nearby, apparently attracted to the spot at the back of the plaza by the sight of women wearing tallitot. Very quickly their ranks swelled into hundreds and they turned into a mob. They surrounded their fellow Jews, taunted them, spit at them and threw stones at them.

One can only suppose that these agitated young men and boys intended to knock some Torah sense into their frightened co-religionists through the sound of stones smashing against the plaza floor or perhaps through the wincing sting of stones cutting skin. Under a relentless hail of projectiles and insults, the police urged the besieged men and women to leave the plaza. They did.

What happened next was reported in the New York Times thus: "The Conservatives tried to regroup outside the plaza but the mob followed them. As they retreated through the Jewish Quarter, they were pelted with garbage and feces from the windows of a yeshivah." (Our emphasis)

Rabbi Andrew Sachs, the director of the Rabbinical Assembly in Israel and the leader of that woe-befallen group of men and women, said he deliberately chose a place far from the Wall to avoid any suggestion of provocation.

Despite his intentions though, it was clear both by the behavior of the mob and by statements of certain haredi spokespersons afterward, that haredi sensibilities had been offended. Indeed, they were incensed.

Even so, no perceived provocation justifies or excuses or condones such ugly, sickening and degrading violence. How far and how deep has hatred taken root that one Jew could do this to another?

The outcry in Israel among secular commentators has been piercing and foreboding. For example, veteran journalist Yosef Lapid, writing in the Jerusalem Post, was so affected by the incident as to describe his feelings in Kafkaesque terms, as someone no longer at home in his own country, as someone being interrogated, on trial by an accusing faceless religious establishment for the crime of having had a secular education: "At this point, I crack. But they don't hear me any more. They are already busy with another defendant. I try to disentangle myself, but my hands are behind my back, tied with t'fillin straps." (Our emphasis)

What the Haredim did was an abject chillul hashem, a desecration of God's name.

Outrage has given way to sadness that one Jew – indeed one human being – should care so little about the dignity and well-being of another that no behavior is too base or too crude in the name of The Almighty.

But as Lapid's commentary proves, past the feeling of sadness are the scandal and the shame that, as a result of the actions of the thugs who claim to be the fervent guardians of its gates, something so breathtaking, so precious and so beautiful as Judaism should be held up to such searing public scorn.

THE FIRST ZIONIST CONFERENCE, BASEL 1897

"Everywhere, where the Jews have settled...among the nations, Jewish misery prevails...not the ordinary misery which is probably the unalterable fate of mankind. It is a peculiar misery, and from which they would be free, were they not Jews."

Not the first Mission Sépharade to Morocco

You reported on the exciting Mission Sépharade to Morocco and Israel (CJN, June 13). The article stated that this was the first UJA Mission to Morocco.

I wish to remind your readers that the first Mission to Morocco was in March 1967. A group of 12 people from Toronto, led by the late Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg visited Morocco, Iran and then Israel as a Leadership Mission of the Toronto United Jewish Appeal. I was among those fortunate enough to go. In Morocco, we were met by the representative of the American Joint Distrubution Committee, who introduced us to the diminishing Jewish community in Casablanca. We visited the Oeuvre de Secours aux Enfants, the ORT schools and La Maison Vieillard, went to Shabbat services and had the opportunity to meet and speak personally to many of the leaders of that community.

We then travelled to Marrakesh, where we again learned from community leaders of the need for understanding and support from Canadian Jewry. This interface between Jews was exciting and enlightening to all of us on the mission. The late Charles Kent and I returned the following year for a "follow-up" visit and directed our effort during the UJA campaign to telling the Toronto community of the needs of our Sephardi brethren.

The problems of immigration, absorption and settlement have not abated. We Canadian Jews must be as always sensitive to the needs of our fellow co-religionists.

'From the Right' obscures the real story

Taube felt the need to enlighten the public's misconceptions about conservatism. It doesn't take too much brilliance to understand why 80 percent of Canadian Jews and 85 percent in the United States consistently reject right-wing parties. The essence of Judaism is about tzedakah and being a caring, and compassionate people and a light unto all nations. Liberalism, social justice and an equitable society have always been uncompromising values that have guided us throughout history. Thatcherism, Reaganomics, Mulroneyism all ran contrary to this basic assumption.

We do know what conservatism means and represents. Your free markets apply to those in a position who are able to take advantage of it — big business, corporate giants. Your free market system and free trade saw us experience a mass exodus of companies and job losses. It's not equal freedoms for everyone. For the wealthy, yes, and for those well established already. With your free markets we also see exploitation of workers due to cheaper wages. The Mike Harris Conservatives' cuts to healthcare, education and communities have gone to pay the cost of his tax scheme that only benefits the wealthy in Ontario. Bank presidents are getting a $200,000 tax gift from the Harris Conservatives. The right wing of Taube's Conservatives support and enable the top 100 CEOs in Canada to continue earning 90 times more than the average Canadians ($2.5 million vs. $30,000) and pay on average three percent personal tax.

Budget cuts of $1 billion plus to education will result in overcrowded classes, cuts to junior kindergarten, music, art, sports and special education programs, resources teachers, and even librarians. Tuition fees are up by as much as 30 percent for universities and colleges. The majority of graduating high school students will soon be unable to afford a higher education. The purpose of all this, of course, is to ensure that the wealthy maintain their status quo and sustain their lifestyle.

A different view of Public Curator

The article entitled "Conference focuses on Ethics and Alzheimer's" (CJN, Montreal edition, June 13), quotes lawyer Wilfred Kravitz as having remarked that "most of it [the bad press the public curator has received lately] is not merited. Many of its workers are decent and kind people."

There is ample information supporting the contrary view. We are the largest group representing users, relatives and caregivers dealing with the Public Curator with members across the entire province. The hundreds of files we have compiled are full of blunders and abuses on a heart-breaking scale. Kravitz has never visited our offices and there is nothing comparable anywhere else, other than with the Public Curator itself whose files are inaccessible. We wonder, then, on what evidence Kravitz makes such an uninformed comment.

According to all authorities — other than Kravitz — the recent bad press appears well deserved.

Separatist vote hit a new low

By JACK JEDWAB

On June 2, Quebecers participated in their fifth election in the past five years.

Many Canadians remember Quebecers' last such trip to the polls, when on the evening of Oct. 30, 1995, they anxiously watched the federalist forces go on to narrowly defeat those who advocated the country's break-up. Some 18 months later, observers regarded the 1997 federal election as the first real test of strength of the sovereigntist movement since that fateful October 1995 evening. Not surprisingly, therefore, the 1997 results were closely scrutinized as to their possible impact on the national unity debate.

Both in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, numerous analysts directed their attention to the share of the popular vote received by the separatist Bloc Québécois on the one hand, and the cumulative total received by the federal Liberal and Conservative parties in la belle province on the other.

Since the defeat of the Charlottetown Accord in 1992, several Quebec analysts interpret federal and provincial elections in referendum-like terms, where the popular vote tends to be seen as a benchmark for the state of national unity. As the numbers came in on June 2, the province's political spin doctors, federalist and sovereigntist alike, were ready to put the best interpretation on the election results as regards to their potential meaning for the future course of the national unity debate. In the end, it was the sovereigntists who were disappointed that the Bloc Québécois received approximately 38 percent of Quebec's popular vote as the balance went largely to the two major federalist parties.

At the start of 1997, the sovereigntists were optimistic about the prospects of the upcoming federal election, which they hoped would help them build momentum en route to another Quebec referendum. And while they may not publicly admit it, the Bloc Québécois initially anticipated obtaining a percentage of Quebec's popular vote that was either equal to, or greater than, the 49.4 percent acquired by the Yes option in the October 1995 referendum.

> 'In the end it was the sovereignists who were disappointed'

Early in the 1997 federal election campaign, it quickly became apparent that the Bloc Québécois could not achieve that objective. So the Bloc was ready to settle on what might be described as a 40/40 scenario where it either surpassed the 40 percent mark in the popular vote and/or obtained more than 40 seats in the House of Commons. In Quebec, polling for most of the month of May showed that the Bloc Québécois, the Liberals and the Conservatives were in a very tight race as to their overall voter support.

In the final 10 days of the campaign, it largely became a two party race, with the polls generally putting the Bloc Québécois slightly ahead of the Liberals.

Many analysts stressed that the 38 percent of popular support acquired by the Bloc represented a significant comedown for the separatist movement.

It is as important as ever to look for constructive solutions to the unity issue

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien

Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard

Shortly after the results came in, federalist leaders were insisting that Quebecers' support for separation was on the wane and that an important number of 1995 Yes voters did not respond to the call of Bouchard, Parizeau, Duceppe and company. (The table below illustrates the decline in support from the 1993 through to the 1997 federal election). For their part, sovereigntist leaders asked Quebec voters to overlook the numbers and instead focus on the 44 seats acquired by the Bloc, which they described as an endorsement of Quebec independence. Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard went so far as to suggest that this was the last federal election in which Quebecers would participate. But despite the happy faces on Gilles Duceppe and company, these sovereigntists knew full well that they suffered an important blow in the 1997 election.

Indeed, the lower levels of popular support for the Bloc Québécois lent credibility to the idea that in the 1995 referendum a not-insignificant group of Quebecers failed to clearly understand that the issue at stake was the break-up of Canada. The 1997 results suggest that an important share of the 49.4 percent of Yes voters did not appear as committed to independence as the separatist leadership has since October 1995 repeatedly insisted that they were.

Who were the Quebec electors that veered away from the Bloc Québécois in this election? Likely to be found on the Yes side in the '95 Quebec referendum, they are presumed to be either soft sovereigntists or soft federalists. Many analysts believe that the federal Conservatives led by the popular Jean Charest had considerable support from this important voting group. Generally estimated at between 15 and 30 percent of the Quebec electorate, this group tends to split votes in favor of the sovereigntist political option. Recent experience has shown that in Quebec's federal and provincial elections, these soft voters tend to split votes in favor of sovereigntist political parties.

In the 1994 provincial election, some observers believed that Mario Dumont's Parti Action Démocratique (ADQ) captured a sufficient number of these "soft" electors to thereby give an edge in several ridings to the Parti Québécois. While this may have been the case in the 1993 federal and 1994 provincial contests, in the recent federal election the vote-splitting appears to have come back, to some extent, to haunt the Bloc Québécois by offering a slight advantage to the Liberals. At the same time, it is to be noted that voter participation was quite low in this election, which appeared to constitute yet a further advantage for the federalist parties. It will be interesting to watch the impact of both the voter turnout and the vote splitting in the next Quebec provincial election.

The 38 percent of the Bloc Québécois has been pegged by some federalists as a new low for the sovereignty movement. There is certainly some political psychology operating here, the effect of which may be very temporary. In effect, it would be imprudent for federalists to get too carried away over the magnitude of the 1997 victory. The results of future polls on sovereignty and support for the Parti Québécois, both of which are probably still in the mid-40 percent range, may risk taking some wind out of federalist sails.

Bouchard is unlikely to call a provincial election until the fall of 1998. He knows that the Quebec electorate is tired of continually being called to the urns. Also, the results of the next Quebec provincial election will be critical for the

There is no underestimating the separatist movement which has in the past demonstrated a keen ability to come from behind in elections and referenda, just as it did in October 1995 when at the start of the campaign it severely trailed the federalist side. Therefore, despite the good federalist performance of 1997, it remains as important as ever to look for constructive solutions to the unity issue as there still is a real possibility of yet another referendum.

Opinions

A lineup is a real event in Israel

The concept of standing in line doesn't have one particular connotation in Israel. Wherever there's a line, there's a different set of expectations.

By Viva Press in Jerusalem

Let me explain just what I mean.

The bus line is more of an illusion than something real. Since I take the bus at least twice a day, I am familiar with the waiting that accompanies this form of transportation. Sometimes while I wait for buses, the people around me stand side by side in a formation that in Canada would be viewed as an orderly queue. But here in Jerusalem, as soon as the bus pulls up to the stop, any semblance of a line that may have existed disappears.

Instead, the "line" of people dissolves into a crush where everyone is trying to push his and her way into the bus first. And don't think waiting for the huddle of passengers to thin out will help. Forget it. The bus driver, believing that you don't really want to get on his bus, perhaps you're waiting for another bus, will close the doors as soon as the last person, the person immediately ahead of you, has got onto the first step of the bus.

So, I push and I shove — and I get pushed and shoved — until I too manage to secure a foothold on the first step.

The bank line and the grocery store line are very similar. The best way to explain the bank line is to tell about my first trip to a bank this summer.

Thirty minutes had passed and I was finally within five clients of my goal in coming to the Bank Hapoalim on King George Street: I had come to change money. Just as client number one had been served and I was about to take a step closer to the tellers, a man came out of nowhere and stood in front of me.

He had been there all the time, he told me.

The person ahead of me confirmed this.

Just because I didn't see him, that did not mean he wasn't there. He had earlier reserved his place behind the guy in front of me, had told this guy to save his place and had then left. Of course, he returned just as his spot in line was close to the front.

Any protesting on my part would have been futile. This use of a "saved place" in a lineup is, I have learned, a common practice.

He was in line — or at least a place was saved for him. He was no freir (chump), why should he wait while someone else could easily save his place for him?

However, I was paying attention when I went to the Hyper Kol grocery store on Hapalmach Street. It was the same story all over again. Someone appeared out of nowhere to claim his place ahead of me in the line.

There I was in the "express line" — one to eight items — when a man butted in front of me. Not wanting to get into an argument, I didn't say anything about his rudeness.

The man behind me did.

He was not ready to let someone just step in and jump the line. The two of them got into a screaming match about how Man A had been there and was coming back to his saved place, while Man B didn't believe Man A was there to save a place in the first place. There was only one way to settle the argument — they both turned to me.

Man B asked me if Man A was, in fact, in front of me. Truthfully, I admitted, I hadn't seen him.

Man A was furious — what did I mean, I hadn't seen him?

I pretended not to notice him and continued walking in the direction of my apartment as if nothing out of the ordinary had happened. He stepped in front of me and said he had one question to ask — what did I mean when I said I hadn't seen him?

In the market line, you really can go unnoticed. No one will "see" you, unless you make sure they do.

A line of sorts forms in front of the scales where your fruit or vegetables are weighed. But the person in front doesn't always get helped first. Rather, the person who swings their goods in the merchant's face or deposits them on the scale first gets helped first.

The customers who patiently wait for their turn — I have to admit, I tend to fall into this category — eventually do get served. But we have to wait much longer.

It's not unusual for me to encounter all of these so-called lineups in one day; I've taken the bus to the bank, stopped in at the supermarket and then gone to the market. And while these lines themselves may not conform to the accepted definition of a line being an orderly arrangement, they give a new meaning to the concept of waiting in line.

Then again, everything in Israel has its own distinctive meaning. That's what makes something as boring as waiting in a line that much more eventful.

Either/or rarely a solution

Not so long ago, shalom was not only the most often-used word in daily Hebrew parlance but also, in some respects, the most controversial. David Ben-Gurion is reported to have said that the word properly describes Israelis: they say shalom when they come and shalom when they leave, which is to say that they are not sure if they are coming or going. Besides being a clever quip, however, it says something about the nature of the word itself. It describes a condition as well as a hope.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

In the years of intifadah, the word assumed a different meaning. It came to signify concession, giving up what was rightfully yours and the type of accommodation that — so it was believed — would eventually lead to the end of the Jewish state.

Since those days, the unlikely has happened: Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres sat down with Yasser Arafat; they all received the Nobel Prize; a Palestinian Authority was set up with its headquarters in Jericho; Israel made peace with Jordan and sent representatives to all but a few Arab states; and peace became the trademark of Israeli policy.

But things are changing again. New developments have rent the fragile fabric of Arab-Israeli relationships and both sides of the conflict have once more returned to demonizing each other.

Perhaps, in the long run, the solution to this problem of two peoples fighting for the same piece of earth may prove intractable if approached only in political terms. Perhaps, if any kind of progress is to be made, it must come because there are also enough person-to-person relationships.

That is why I have been greatly impressed by the Canada-International Scientific Exchange Program (CISEPO). Established by Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital and the University of Toronto, it is the result of years of efforts by a small group of medics who believe that the physician's duty to heal knows no bounds and that its practice enables people to trust each other and find a common bond in the healing process. CISEPO recently inaugurated a lecture program across cultural borders. Sponsored by Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, the Israel Medical Association (Canadian chapter), Bathurst Jewish Centre and Palestine House in Canada, it is a public expression of what a small group of physicians has for some time practised in a quiet yet effective way.

Headed by Dr. Arnold Noyek it has found a ready response in Jordan among members of the Palestinian Authority and in Israel itself. Now 15 years old, its partnerships include physicians, exchange programs with Thailand, Brazil, Australia and others.

"Canada is seen as playing a role in facilitating and organizing," Noyek said. The group's present focus is to provide screening for hearing loss among high-risk-school children and to continue managing their progress. Being child-oriented, CISEPO has a wonderful chance of common acceptance, and its next area of concern will be the elderly.

Efforts of this kind may move politicians on both sides to view reality in a moderating light. Either/or has rarely been a solution for anything, but both/and often has.

Why scorn the idealism of youth?

By Simone Joseph in Toronto

I agree that young people may be naive and inexperienced in certain ways, but why do so many adults scorn their idealism? Why do they insist on telling us we'll know better when we're older? Do they think that later on in life, we will lose our ruach (enthusiasm) and they are therefore merely preparing us for this eventual doom? Or do they refuse to take us seriously because they are jaded and cannot relate to our fresh enthusiasm and excitement?

I think many adults have a lot to learn from young, idealistic people who have fresh ideas and a new perspective on life. That's why it is so important for youth's optimism, fresh ideas and enthusiasm to have an outlet. Thankfully, over the past six weeks, I have had an outlet for my creativity, ideas, and enthusiasm — The CJN. But, from my own experiences as a student in the journalism program at Ryerson Polytechnic University, I know that many young people labor for hours on end improving their resumes, hoping someone will open a door for them, take them seriously and listen to their ideas.

I don't mean to imply that all adults are jaded and scorn young people's ideas. Often, youth are taken seriously and their idealism is not scorned. Instead, opportunities are extended to them.

Many opportunities are given to young people through internships and work experiences in Israel. Fellowships in Jewish leadership positions are often awarded by Jewish organizations. For example, Dena Libman, a York University graduate, was the first Canadian to receive the Hillel Arline and David L. Bittker Fellowship to work in Washington D. C. as a Jewish campus professional in the Hillel international office.

Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto, an umbrella organization serving the campuses of York, U of T, Ryerson and Seneca in Toronto, has also taken young people seriously, as demonstrated by their leadership seminars and May's awards ceremony honoring outstanding volunteers.

The CJN's on-campus section and the addition of young columnists within its pages demonstrate that this paper values the passions and opinions of today's youth.

Other media, such as the Toronto Star, have also shown their interest in young people's opinions. The Toronto Star has a regular Under 20 column on the front page of the Life section. Also, the Star often publishes pieces from a national wire service called the Young People's Press, which operates out of Toronto and aims to publish the opinions and writing of young people.

The recent YTV awards honored youth in recognition of their achievements. Nava Mizrahi of Vancouver, the international president of B'nai Brith Girls, won an award for public service.

A friend of mine who is in international relations at the University of Toronto is currently working in the field she loves, human rights, at the United Nations in Ottawa. Another friend, a French major at the University of Western Ontario, recently returned from a study program in Quebec, made possible by a French language bursary. Their summers have been enriched by these challenging experiences, but only because they have been given the opportunity and because someone had faith in their ability.

My internship at The CJN has made me realize what a difference an opportunity can make in a young person's career and personal growth. To have your idealism and ideas taken seriously is a great feeling. It's wonderful to be treated as an intelligent adult who has potential, is competent and is valued, rather than as an inexperienced adolescent. An open door can enrich, brighten and stimulate a young person.

So the next time someone young enters your workplace armed with a resume loaded with volunteer experience and a bright smile, or the next time your young employee suggests a radical new idea, remember this column. Take young people seriously and don't try to crush our idealism. We are the heroes, leaders, parents and teachers of tomorrow.

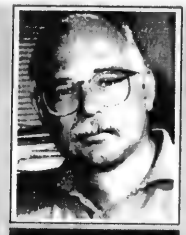
Basel prepares to mark Zionist centennial

Israel was conceived in Basel, Switzerland, a century ago. At the first Zionist Congress here in August 1897, Theodor Herzl



By Sheldon Kirshner

wrote in his diary: "If I were to sum up the Congress...it would be this: At Basel I founded the Jewish state. If I said this aloud today, I would be greeted with universal laughter. In five years perhaps, and certainly in 50 years, everyone will perceive it."

Almost precisely 50 years later, the United Nations passed a resolution partitioning Palestine, and Israel was born.

Starting this week, Basel – a charming city of Gothic, Renaissance and Baroque buildings and twisting medieval streets – marks the centennial of the first Zionist Congress with a panoply of cultural events.

Kicking off things on June 27, the University of Basel plans an exhibition documenting the life and times of Herzl – from his childhood in Budapest to his first trip to Palestine – and the impact of the Zionist movement on history.

This is to be followed by exhibitions about Israel, an international academic symposium on Zionism and anti-Semitism, a one-man play about Herzl, concerts and Israel Weeks in restaurants and stores.

The centenary ceremony, the crowning touch, will take place on Aug. 31 at the Stadt Casino – where the first Zionist Congress unfolded – and will be attended by, among others, Swiss dignitaries, the chair of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency, the speaker of the Knesset, several members of the Israeli parliament, the director-general of Israel's foreign ministry and Jewish community leaders from around the world.

Five thousand foreign visitors are expected in Basel for the anniversary, according to Dennis Rhein, head of the centennial organizing committee and vice-chair of Basel's tourist board.

The original estimate of 10,000 was scaled down in response to the still-swirling controversy over Switzerland's contentious wartime dealings with Nazi Germany and over the insensitive manner in which Swiss banks handled postwar claims to Jewish dormant accounts.

As a result of these embarrassing disputes, Israeli President Ezer Weizman cancelled his proposed trip to Basel and the European Jewish Congress changed its venue from Basel to Paris, said Rhein in an interview.

But these glitches have neither dampened Rhein's enthusiasm nor prompted other major Jewish organizations to cancel their participation.

Rhein, a Swiss Jew, began planning the big party in 1993 at the initiative of the canton of Basel. A $2 million budget has been allocated. Sponsors include Basel's tourist board, Swissair, several Swiss banks, two Israeli banks, the B'nai Brith lodge in Basel, the Manor department store chain and Francois Loeb, the sole Jewish member of the Swiss federal parliament.

A visitor who finds himself or herself in Basel, Switzerland's largest metropolis after Zurich, will be impressed by its beauty.

Lying along the banks of the Rhine River, which is spanned by quaint bridges bedecked with colorful Swiss cantonal flags, Basel is tailor-made for leisurely strolls.

In a one-hour walk, you'll pass the gentrified Heuberg district; the tree-lined Rheinwg, a pleasant riverside esplanade of elegant old homes and lively cafes; the Rathaus, the towering town hall adorned with murals; the vegetable and flower stalls on Marktplatz; and Freiestrasse, Basel's major shopping thoroughfare.

Points of Jewish interest are the Stadt Casino, where further Zionist congresses were held in 1898, 1899 and 1901, and the Hotel Des Troi Rois, where Herzl stayed during the 1897 convention.

The Stadt Casino, which adjoins a restaurant and an outdoor cafe, is now a music hall. An unobtrusive black marble plaque, engraved in German and Hebrew, commemorates the first Zionist Congress, which produced the Basel Program. It outlined a visionary plan for the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, then an Ottoman dominion.

In Herzl's day, Zionism was widely considered a pie-in-the-sky philosophy, scorned by the majority of Jews. Herzl – an assimilated journalist – originally chose Munich, Germany, to spell out his Zionist dream. But in the face of opposition from anti-Zionist Jews, he opted for Basel. Basel's rabbi, Arthur Cohn, sympathized with the strange new ideology, and Basel had a kosher restaurant.

The beige-and-white Hotel Des Troi Rois is supposedly Switzerland's oldest hostelry (1026). The cost of a single room runs from $255 to $375 per night, but in fin de siecle Basel it was expensive as well. Herzl checked into room 126, a functional rectangular space whose balcony affords a panoramic view of the Rhine. There is a famous photograph of him leaning over the railing.

Oddly enough, the hotel does not trade on its association with Herzl. Its glossy brochure boasts of famous guests – Napoleon, Voltaire, Charles Dickens and an assortment of royalty – yet Herzl goes unmentioned.

When Herzl swept into Basel, its Jewish population was barely a thousand. Not much has changed in 100 years, Basel being home to no more than 2,000 Jews today.

The community traces its origins to the 13th century, when Basel was a German free city. During the Black Plague, the Jews were accused of poisoning the wells, and 600 were burned at the stake. After an earthquake devastated Basel, Jews from neighboring Alsace were invited to settle. But they, too, were eventually driven out.

For approximately 400 years, Basel was officially off-limits to all but a handful of Jews, notably Hebrew proofreaders, who were in demand because, from the late 16th century, Basel was a centre of Hebrew printing.

The present community, the third since the Middle Ages, was founded by Jews from Alsace and Eastern Europe, who consecrated their first synagogue in 1868, two years after Swiss Jewry was granted full civic rights. Restored a few years ago, the Moorish-style shul has been designated a national monument.

On the grounds are a school, a mikvah, a community centre, a library and Basel's one and only kosher restaurant, the Topas, which is under the supervision of Rabbi Yisroel Meyer Levinger, the brother of Moshe Levinger, the Hebron firebrand.

A short distance away is Switzerland's sole Jewish museum, a modest repository of religious objects and memorabilia, including a montage of the trailblazing 1897 Zionist Congress. Outside, in the courtyard, are red sandstone fragments of rabbinic gravestones inscribed in Hebrew.

Since some Jews in Basel trace their ancestry to southern Alsace and the Black Forest in Germany, a half-day trip to these places is instructive.

In Hegenheim, just across the Swiss border in France, a sculptor's studio has supplanted the remains of a synagogue. The Jewish cemetery across the road contains 10,000 tombstones. No Jews live in Hegenheim today.

In Sulzberg, 60 kilometres northwest of Basel, the shul has been converted into a memorial centre for a vanished Jewish community whose last member was deported in 1940. Half hidden by a dense forest, the Jewish cemetery is in remarkably good condition.

Timothy McVeigh and the meaning of justice

The death sentence in the trial of Timothy McVeigh has stirred renewed debate about the morality of the death penalty.

Does McVeigh, whose callous crime killed 168 people and shattered the lives of countless others, deserve to die?

Comparative Law

The debate about this basic ethical question is ancient. In many ways, it is a debate about how to understand the Torah (or Hebrew Bible), the basis of Judaism and Christianity. What is the Torah's theory of justice?

One passage in the Torah that causes a lot of controversy is "an eye for an eye" (Exodus 21:23). The Torah, if understood literally, seems to be telling us that it is equitable to blind someone who has blinded his friend. To many, punishing someone by blinding them seems ugly, grotesque and inhumane.

This passage is singled out for criticism by Jesus in his Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 5:38-40). Jesus tells his disciples not to follow the law of "an eye for an eye," but rather to "turn the other cheek" to anyone who slaps them, and to give the shirt off their back to anyone they have a dispute with. These passages in Matthew have motivated some Christian theologians to compare the Christian Bible's attitude toward "love" with the Torah's attitude to "vengeance."

When teaching a class on this subject to a group of university students, I found to my chagrin, that this charge is still hurled at the Torah and Judaism.

In reality, if one reads the Talmud, it is extremely clear that the Jewish tradition does not mandate the practical implementation of "an eye for an eye." The Talmud (Baba Kamma 83a) produces a whole battery of textual and logical arguments to show it is not possible that "an eye for eye" is in any way literal. Someone who assaults his neighbor must pay him for the economic loss of an eye, as a payment for medical expenses and emotional pain. This verse is understood to mean "the payment of the value of an eye for an eye." This tradition is followed by many Jewish commentaries, including the commentary of Abraham Ibn Ezra, a prominent 12th-century Spanish rabbi.

The Talmud has a similar attitude to the application of the death penalty. Although the Torah prescribes the death penalty for some crimes, the Talmud (Makkot 7a) says that its application by the courts was extremely rare (according to some opinions, as little as once in 70 years!)

This idea was taken to its extreme by Rabbi Tarphon and Rabbi Akiva, two of the rabbis who authored the Talmud. They found it impossible to apply the death penalty. In capital cases, they would cross-examine witnesses until they found an inconsistency in their testimony and then throw the case out.

Other rabbis disagreed with Rabbi Tarphon and Rabbi Akiva. Rabbi Simon Ben Gamliel found their view too extreme, for there would be no deterrent against the commission of murder.

Clearly, the talmudic traditions have a kinder, gentler interpretation of Torah's punishments. An "eye for an eye" means money; the death penalty is rarely enforced. But if this is so, why does the Torah say "an eye for an eye"? Shouldn't the Torah be more clear and explain that it only means financial compensation?

It is here that we see the unique perspective of the Jewish tradition.

Ovadiah Sforno, a 16th-century Italian rabbi, explains that the Torah chooses to write "an eye for an eye" literally, because that is what the criminal deserves. Perhaps we should not enforce this judgment; it may be too grotesque and painful and may not truly fit the crime. However, it is still important that we be aware that true justice means that the criminal gets the punishment he deserves, that "an eye for an eye" is a fitting punishment for a violent criminal. This is why the Torah writes "an eye for an eye", and demands the death penalty.

The talmudic tradition, concerned about applying these laws, realizes that it is too extreme for a compassionate society to apply these penalties on a regular basis. For this reason, it says that "an eye for an eye" means financial compensation, and that the death penalty was carefully reserved for heinous crimes.

The Jewish tradition does not codify "vengeance." Rather, it tries to synthesize the demands of justice with the need for compassion. To talk soothingly about love, without having any standard of justice, is truly inhumane, and will cause anarchy.

The McVeigh trial may be one of those instances where we must follow the dictates of justice alone. It may be a crime in which the blood of the victims calls out too loudly and demands the ultimate punishment. But even if it is, we must remember that this is an exception. As the Tanach says, God demands us to "do justice and love kindness." (Michah 6:8)

What comes after graduation exercises?

We have reached the time of university graduations and commencement speeches. Beyond the ritual of cap and gown and old-grad sentimentality lurks a paramount question: Apart from the accumulation of facts and information, what perceptions and values have students received as they enter a complex and uncertain future?

• Is there intellectual curiosity? Truth often disturbs what makes us most comfortable. The tracking down of ideas involves greater risk than the pouring of facts into a receptacle called the brain. In the words of Lincoln Steffens, "It is dangerous to think — always." But the educated must take the risk.

Our age demands open-mindedness, unrelenting doubt, ceaseless probing of life's problems at every stage, with enough independence and flexibility to confront emerging and unprecedented dilemmas. There must be an awareness of the vastness of human ignorance and an appetite for learning that is satisfied only by lifelong analysis and inquiry.

• Is there concern for the social ills of society? Contemporary difficulties are explosive, increasingly numerous and perilously urgent. Some examples? Race prejudice, which sabotages the struggle for peace and undermines the security and moral health of the world; political chauvinism, which, in one country after another, prefers unrest and disunity to mature compromise; emotional frustrations that often lead to scapegoatism and group hostility; hatred for an "enemy" nation, so violent that some people are more eager to see that enemy expunged than to keep their own children alive. For the educated person there is nothing harder than the softness of indifference.

• Is there an appreciation for moral and esthetic values? Our grasp of knowledge extends beyond the technological. Scientists have deduced how the first primeval form of life may have started on our planet — and they now understand the chemical mechanism of heredity. We almost know the complete formula for destroying a person's inner resources and converting him or her into a biological machine, a brute without values, without prin-

The Jewish cemetery: House of the living

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Have you ever wondered why one of the Hebrew names for a cemetery is beit ha-chaim (house of the living)?

Certainly there is some logic behind this semantic irony, just as there is a trove of stories in the tombstones behind the cemetery gates.

Most people venture into a cemetery only on the sad occasion of a funeral. For those who come in search of the grave of an ancestor or relative, the beit ha-chaim may live up to its mystifying Hebrew name by helping to bring memories back to life.

A cemetery office may provide the location and some of the information recorded on a tombstone, but it is important to visit the gravesite in order to learn as much as possible about the deceased. The words and symbols chiselled onto a tombstone, as well as its physical location, may reveal a great deal about the person it memorializes.

English inscription tells part of story

On most stones, the English inscription tells only part of the story. The Hebrew lettering provides the names of the deceased and his or her father via the customary patronym: Shlomo son of David, for example, or Dinah daughter of Jacob.

Birth and death dates are usually given in Hebrew according to the Jewish calendar. With a bit of practice, these can be read and translated quite easily into our familiar Gregorian notation. (For help with reading a Jewish tombstone, refer to From Generation to Generation, Arthur Kurzweil's excellent introductory guidebook to Jewish genealogy.)

Sometimes the town or province in the Old Country where the deceased was born is proudly recorded on the stone. More commonly, the cemetery section itself suggests a place of origin: for instance, the Apter section points to the Polish town of Apt or Opotow, the Minsker shul section refers to Minsk and the Hebrew Men of England section obviously indicates England.

Historically and even to the present day, Jewish burials usually bear an affiliation with a landsmanschaft organization, synagogue, mutual benefit society, burial society or other group through which more information about the deceased may be attained.

Pictographic symbols adorning headstones often have specific meanings. A star of David is a male symbol, candles or a menorah are female. A pitcher or jug signifies a member of the Levite tribe, the "blessed hands" a member of the kohen or priestly tribe. A row of books suggests a learned man, an ark and Torah scroll is for a rabbi, a violin for a musician, a quill pen for a writer.

A lamb or bed often poignantly adorns a child's tombstone, while a broken tree trunk or candle symbolizes a life abruptly cut short. Pictures of animals may refer to specific names: a dove for Jonah, a bear for Dov, a lion for Judah or Aryeh or Leo, an eagle for Adler, a rooster for Hahn.

Pick a sunny day for your cemetery visit, the better to read inscriptions eroded by time. Pouring water over a worn inscription may improve its legibility. Another method, which must always be used with caution so as not to damage the stone, is to trowel some shaving cream over the engraved characters to enhance their legibility. Make sure to wash the stone clean afterwards.

Make rubbing of tombstone

Yet another method is to make a rubbing of the tombstone delicately onto a sheet of newsprint. If the inscription is still hard to read, try reflecting light from a mirror onto the stone, or come back later when the sun is shining from a different angle. It is perfectly appropriate to take a photograph of a tombstone, but do not expect the result to be any easier to read than the stone itself.

When visiting a cemetery, dress with decorum and do not do anything that might disturb others. Do not go on Shabbat or a Jewish holiday.

Eating, drinking and smoking is forbidden within cemetery gates, and boisterous behavior is equally taboo.

If the idea of visiting a cemetery seems strange, keep in mind that each inscription was meant to be read and each tombstone meant to keep a memory alive. It is by remembering the dead, by seeing with our eyes and reflecting with our hearts, that we help transform a cemetery into a beit ha-chaim, a house of the living.

Educated must have inner strength

ciples and without humanity.

Our colleges and universities must produce men and women with more than knowledge. They must become more than what D.H. Lawrence called "crammed wastepaper baskets." In this day of violence and widespread lawlessness, the educated must have the inner strength to stand steadfastly against evil.

Where do we get our persistence to overcome setbacks and disappointments? Whence comes the impulse to aid our fellow men instead of striding over them in the struggle for personal success? Where is the wellspring for the voluntary offering of service to the community, to our neighbor?

• Is there proper humility? An educated person is one whose mind is always watching itself. Shakespeare said: "Modest doubt is called the beacon of the wise." Voltaire suggested that the little he knew he owed to his ignorance. Why then transmit simplistic explanations for the complex problems of society or for the supreme riddles of the universe?

Changes in our age are so rapid that political and scientific revolutions occur within the span of a single lifetime. The youngest undergraduate has already witnessed greater political, industrial and social change than the pre-20th century would know in several generations.

• Is there a critical method of evaluation? We live in an age of information explosion. But we are also in the middle of a mis-information explosion. With the proliferation of mass communication, we are surrounded by hawkers, pitchmen and persuaders, hidden and overt. Bombarded daily by millions of words in print and the electronic media, we need some kind of critical apparatus to decide whom and what to believe, and to what degree.

Never has rationality been so badly needed as in this period when some tired intellectuals themselves are spearheading the drive towards anti-intellectualism.

One of humankind's most profitable resources for progress and for peace is in the universities of the free world. To realize their potential, they must mould men and women of intellect and spirit. What a tremendous challenge it is to instil the five ideas indicated above into their hearts and minds.

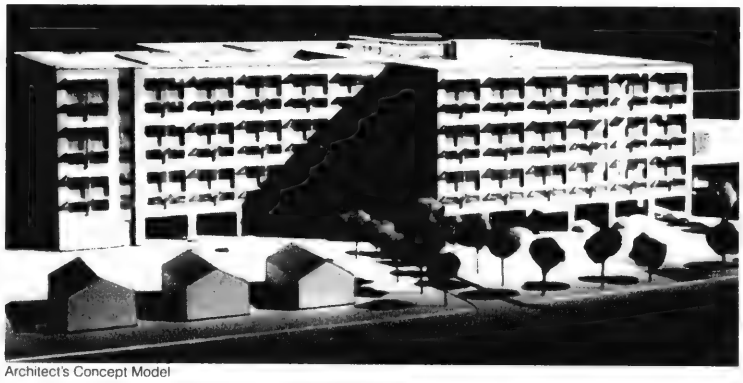
Baycrest Programs are as Varied as the Needs of our Elderly!



Architect's Concept Model

You know Baycrest. It's a vital part of our community, serving our elderly for more than 75 years. Today, Baycrest serves about 2,000 people every day. But take a look at the list below. There's probably more to Baycrest than you know.

Did you know... most Baycrest programs provide help to seniors who live at home, either with their families or on their own. At Baycrest, we are constantly monitoring the needs of the community and ensuring our programs meet those needs.

Did you know... Baycrest is actively involved in education and training. As an academic centre fully affiliated with the University of Toronto, many of our staff also teach young people how to care for seniors. Every year, hundreds of students come to Baycrest to receive experience and training.

Did you know... research at Baycrest is contributing to a better understanding of how to care for seniors. Our researchers regularly visit other countries to share their findings. Scientists from around the world also come to Baycrest to share their work and to participate in research initiated right here.

In order to continue providing the kind of service our seniors deserve, we're asking for your help. Please, give generously to the Baycrest Campaign.

Here are some of the dozens of programs Baycrest provides to assist our elderly now and in the future.

Polish Jewish woman searches for natural family

By SIMONE JOSEPH
CJN Student Intern

TORONTO — At the age of 46, Maria Janicka discovered something that drove her to research her roots and to try to locate her natural family — she discovered that she is Jewish.

Janicka, currently in Toronto visiting family, is reaching out to Toronto's Jewish community because many Polish Jews immigrated to Toronto after World War II.

"I'm talking to everyone, in the belief that I will find a trace or something about my origin," she said, speaking through a translator.

Raised in Poland as a Roman Catholic, she was told 11 years ago that she did not belong to the family that had raised her.

Wladyslawa Hajduk, a close neighbor and friend of Janicka's mother, said she was present when Janicka was given away in 1943.

She said Janicka's true last name is Reiman and that Janicka's natural family stayed at a Nazi transit camp in Zwierzyniec.

Janicka remembers what she believes are memories of the camp.

"We couldn't sit, we couldn't lie down, we were standing one by one behind a fence," she said.

For 14 years, Janicka lived in the village of Sochy, approximately three kilometres from where the Zwierzyniec camp was located.

She believes that in 1943, when she was about 2½, her family left the camp for the train station. However, Janicka never reached the train station, because her natural mother met with Anastazja Swist, the woman who eventually adopted her.

"I was crying because I was accustomed to being with someone else. The person who took care of me tried to assure me someone would come soon," she said.

Janicka remembers escaping to a forest with Swist. She said she thinks Swist took her there because she was afraid of the Nazis.

"As I recall, I heard the name Reiman in the forest," she said.

Hajduk confirmed that there is a forest between the camp and the train station.

The Swist family waited for Janicka's natural family to claim her, but they never did, and in 1954, the Swists adopted Janicka.

"When I realized I was not from this family, I tried to understand that this lady [her adoptive mother] did a very good thing. I really appreciate the fear, and that she sacrificed her life at that time," Janicka said.

When Janicka speaks of her adoptive mother, her eyes well up with tears and she proudly admits that she had a special grave built for her mother when she died.

To Janicka, what was striking about her upbringing was that while her four siblings were baptized, she was not.

She also said she noticed a difference in appearance between herself and the rest of the family: Janicka is dark and her adoptive family is fair.

When Janicka's adoptive mother died in 1986, she divided the property among the family, but Janicka only received two small tablecloths.

She said many members of her adoptive family were partisans who fought against the Nazis. "It was a very patriotic family."

Janicka's adoptive father, Jozef Swist, was the head of a partisan group called AK (Armia Krajawa, National Army) whose goal was to fight Nazism and communism.

She said although she was raised as a Catholic, and they went to church on Sundays and celebrated Christmas and Easter, her adoptive father was not religious.

"He showed tolerance for us. He told us we had to believe only in the Ten Commandments," she said.

Janicka said her father wasn't the only member of the Swist family involved in a partisan group. One of her brothers planted a bomb under a Nazi train transporting sugar for the Germans and her sister delivered mail between partisan messengers.

At the age of 57, Janicka recently visited a synagogue, Adath Israel Congregation in North York, for the first time.

She said there are no synagogues in Gdansk, Poland, where she lives and she bought a book in Polish with instruction on how to behave in a synagogue and how to pray.

Janicka said she likes Judaism because "it's based on the Old Testament and it has not been changed. It's stable."

Because she cannot read Hebrew, Yiddish or English, she is looking for a book in Polish about Jewish customs and culture.

Janicka said she considers herself Jewish. "I feel a closer relationship to Judaism than Roman Catholicism," she said.

"I plan to tell my daughter about it [my background] and to convince her to change her religion as well," she said.

In 1989, Janicka started to research her origins. For almost three years, she spent much of her vacation time visiting museums of Holocaust history, including Majdanek in Lublin and Brzezinka near Auschwitz.

"I thought that I would find somebody of the same name [Reiman]. I wanted to find out my roots, my origin," she said, but she didn't find any clues to her origin.

In 1993, on the 50th anniversary of the Zwierzyniec camp, author Czeslaw Sluzewski handwrote an inscription to Janicka in his book, Transitional Nazi Camp in Zwierzyniec. The dedication read "To Ms. Maria Janicka — let this book help to reflect on the tragical years of occupation. Sochy, 01.06.1993."

Janicka said there are no Reimans in her neighborhood in Poland and so far, she has not found any members of her natural family.

If you have information on Janicka's natural family, please phone 621-2965 (if you speak English) or call Janicka at 695-2547 (if you speak Polish).

She will be returning to Poland on July 2. After that, phone the first number.

Sweet Beginnings offers alternative for disabled kids

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sweet Beginnings is believed to be the only Jewish integrated preschool program in York Region, according to one of the founders of the school. It offers a program for disabled children who are integrated with non-disabled children.

Opened by Aish Hatorah at the Aish Hatorah Dan Family Community Centre on Clark Avenue West in Thornhill as one of its outreach projects, Sweet Beginnings, a licensed, non-profit school, is completing its first "overwhelmingly successful season," says Lillian Sirota.

From three morning programs with 26 children this year, next season will include both morning and afternoon classes with a capacity of 60 children.

"We promote Jewish unity through quality Jewish education for children and the entire family," says Sirota. "Our doors are open to all Jewish children and we recognize and cater to the individual learning styles, special needs and unique backgrounds of every child. Appreciating this diversity, we are committed to the integration of a small number of special needs children in our program."

The school was founded by Sirota, the coordinator; Gail Michalowicz, the director; and Aliza Wrightman, a physiotherapist. Sirota and Michalowicz worked at Zareinu, a Jewish school for children with special needs.

"We created the school because we felt that there wasn't a Jewish integrated centre for children." The school has a qualified staff of Early Childhood Education teachers with junior kindergarten degrees, a pediatric occupational therapist and a resource teacher.

Children with special needs, she says, may have physical or emotional developmental delays. She explained that the integrated program enables children to foster feelings of "sensitivity, responsibility and appreciation" for diversity in others.

"And Sweet Beginnings is a place where children can experience the beauty and relevance of Judaism in an exciting, dynamic and meaningful way," she said.

A program called Moms and Tots – ages 18 months to 30 months – runs two days a week. The pre-nursery program – 24 to 30 months – is three days a week, the nursery program for children 2½ to 3½ years is five days a week, and an afternoon senior nursery and junior kindergarten is held five days a week for children 3½ to 4½.

"Integration is wonderful for children with special needs because it helps them socially and emotionally and it helps them model the children with non special needs. And at a very young age, the non special needs children learn to accept children who are different."

Sirota believes in early childhood education because children from one to three have a large capacity to learn "and it is very important that it is not considered babysitting as some people think."

She adds that some of the non-disabled children may need some help in some areas of development, such as language, stuttering and social interaction, which are so important at this age. "We try to work with all the individual children at different levels of their development."

Jewish war veterans prepare to go overseas

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish war veterans will join their American confrères for a historic trip to Poland, Belarus and Lithuania starting next month.

Twenty-six members of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada (JWV) and six of their relatives from the United States — also veterans or former partisans — will travel to those countries to pay tribute to the victims of the Holocaust and to Jewish partisans and Resistance fighters who died battling the Nazis.

There's a very real possibility that the president of Poland, Alexander Kwasniewski, will join the trip's participants at an official memorial ceremony at Auschwitz.

According to tour leader and JWV director Lou VanDelman, Kwasniewski's office has expressed a keen interest in the president's attendance, but a NATO meeting in Madrid could keep him away.

However, VanDelman said, several high-ranking Polish, Canadian and American officials have confirmed they will attend the memorial service at Auschwitz, where a wreath-laying is planned. Canada's ambassador to Poland, Serge April, is slated to attend, as are the U.S. consul general in Krakow, Israel's military attache in Poland and several high-ranking Polish government representatives. A Polish military guard of honor will also take part.

From July 6 to 18, the March of the Liberators, as the trip has been dubbed, will take the war veterans and one-time partisans to the sites of Auschwitz/Birkenau and to Warsaw. In Lithuania, they'll visit Vilna. In Belarus, they will go to Breslow and to the capital, Minsk. Participants will be encouraged to visit the smaller towns and shtetls where they were born, VanDelman added.

JWV national commander Sam Pasternack will be on the mission. Most participants are from Toronto, but there will be two from Montreal, and some are bringing their children.

The trip, the first of its kind, was planned with help from the Foreign Affairs department and Liberal MP Jim Peterson. It came about because many war veterans feel time is running out.

"We felt now is the time to make a pilgrimage. It's one way to pass the torch to our children," VanDelman said. The trip will also serve to show Poles that "Jews fought in World War II, in every army, in every battle," he added.

Bucks launch Weizmann Chair

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A symposium titled Science For the 21st Century was held recently at the University of Toronto in honor of Roel Buck and his wife, Dorothy Gordon Buck, on the establishment of the Roel Buck-Weizmann Chair in Chemical Physics.

Paul Brumer, a professor in U of T's chemistry department, is the chair's first incumbent. Brumer received his PhD in chemical physics at Harvard University, did post-doctoral work at the Weizmann Institute of Science and was a lecturer in astronomy at the Harvard College Observatory before joining the U of T in 1975.

Buck, who served in the Canadian Armed Forces, where he was a member of the Canadian Engineering Corps, studied engineering at McGill University. He then began to develop and manufacture automotive products.

President of RCB Holdings and chair of Autosystems Manufacturing Inc., Buck has been a tireless worker for Canadian and Israeli charities and has been active on numerous boards, including the executive committee of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science.

A graduate of U of T, Gordon Buck is a commercial/investment real estate professional. She has been an active member of numerous community organizations and has served on the boards of the North-western General Hospital, The Guild of All Arts, the Central Hospital and the Hincks Centre.

Prof. Marsha Chandler, dean of the Faculty of Arts and Science thanked the Bucks for their "generosity, vision and leadership" in establishing the chair in chemical physics, which will enable the U of T to establish international ties.

At a reception following the symposium, Buck, said of Blumer and Shapiro, "Together, these talented individuals and leading institutions will spark the new thinking that will bring untold benefits to two dynamic industrial nations heading into the new millennium.

MORRIS KAUFMAN:
A committed community presence

Morris Kaufman

Jewish Toronto has lost one of its most staunch supporters.

Morris Kaufman, who died last week at age 85, will be remembered for his endless generosity to numerous Jewish causes, his cordial manner and unique ability to influence others by his own example.

"There wasn't an aspect of the Jewish community that Morris was not involved in," recalls long-time friend and colleague Ben Schneider. "His sense of community was unparalleled."

Although Kaufman, who immigrated to Toronto as a young boy, was a successful businessman and owner of his own metal smelting company, Toronto Refiners, many of his days and evenings were spent campaigning for various charities and projects and meeting with his peers to discuss urgent community matters.

Kaufman, who helped drive the merger between the Goel Tzedec and the McCaul Street synagogues to create Beth Tzedec Congregation, eventually became the shul's President. Kaufman also served as Chairman of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, UJA Federation's predecessor, in 1966, and as founding Chair of UJA's Endowment Fund.

Schneider, who was Executive Director of UJA Federation during Kaufman's term as Chairman, remembers his colleague's straightforward demeanor, evident from his first major canvass of a wealthy Toronto businessman.

Schneider also recalls Kaufman's relentless campaigning during the Six Day War. Arriving late to a fundraising meeting he had organized for the membership of a Toronto golf and country club, Kaufman was shocked to learn how little money the group of wealthy businessmen had raised. "He tore up the pledge cards," recounts Schneider, "and insisted the donors reach deeper into their pockets — and they did."

As President of Associated Hebrew Schools, Kaufman, almost single-handedly, raised hundreds of thousands of dollars for the capital campaign to build additional schools during the late 60's and early 70's. At community gatherings he was often introduced as "Morris the Magician" because of his unrivalled success in raising funds.

"Morris spent hours upon hours meeting with contributors," notes close family friend Sam Shainhouse. "He was able to reach so many people with his idealism, and honest manner."

"Morris never walked away from a meeting empty handed," Schneider recalls, "he just had a way with people."

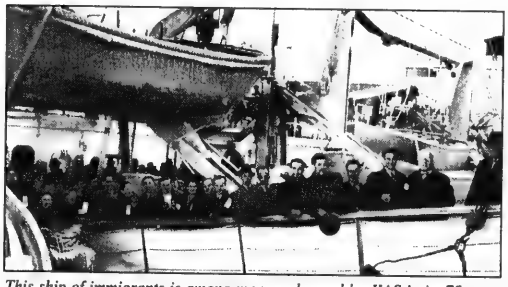
HISTORY AND MUSIC MARK JIAS ANNIVERSARY

Jewish Immigrant Aid Service will soon be celebrating 75 years of assistance in song. Early next fall, JIAS is holding a gala concert to mark nearly a century of helping Jewish immigrants create new homes in Canada.

The concert, co-sponsored by UJA Federation, will be held October 27 at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, and will feature Toronto singer Theresa Tova, Toronto Symphony Orchestra violinist Mark Skazinetsky, and master of ceremonies Ralph Benmergui. Many of the performers - some of them former JIAS clients - are immigrants.

Sheila Freeman, who co-chairs the 75th Anniversary Committee with Barbara Stupp, calls it "a wonderful way to celebrate the musical talent that immigrants bring to Toronto's Jewish community, and a way to showcase UJA Federation's continued support for JIAS." The concert will incorporate Yiddish songs, classical melodies, and contemporary music. Proceeds go to JIAS scholarships and bursaries.

JIAS is also producing a Heritage Book, an archival document featuring a cross-section of Toronto's Jewish business, organization, and family histories, which will be unveiled at the concert. The book will be as inclusive as possible, according to co-ordinator Hindy Nosek-Abelson. "We're not just printing stories of the rich and famous," she says. Those who wish to contribute a story involving personal, congregational, family, or business history should contact the JIAS office at (416) 630-6481. Although JIAS is asking story contributors to pay for space in the book, consideration will be given to those who can't afford full rates.



This ship of immigrants is among many welcomed by JIAS in its 75 year history.

Since 1922, JIAS has assisted 200,000 Jewish immigrants through training, jobs, shelter, clothing, and integration. Six of the fifteen current executive board members are former JIAS clients.

JIAS helps new immigrants learn English, and employs Russian social workers to ease the transition for those arriving from the former Soviet Union. "They feel very safe when they come to JIAS, because they know that they're being understood," says JIAS Toronto President Sandy Atlin.

"I always saw this work as the essence of Judaism and the highest form of tzedakah, helping brothers and sisters escape from what was a bad situation and giving them tools to make a new start," she adds.

DINNER TO HONOUR RABBI WITTY

Rabbi Irwin Witty will step down from a long and distinguished career as Executive Director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education at the end of the month. His more than 27 years of service has helped shape one of the most advanced Jewish education systems in North America.

A tribute dinner to honour Rabbi Witty is being held on Sunday, September 21, at the Inn on the Park.

Rabbi Irwin Witty

Members of the community are invited to attend.

Rabbi Witty, who also serves as Dean of Toronto's Jewish Teachers' Seminary (Midrasha L'Morim), has spent his entire adult life committed to Jewish education. "I've always loved Jewish learning," he explains. "It's the essence of who I am."

In 1969 he assumed his current position with the Board of Jewish Education and became a major force in the development of all aspects of Toronto's Jewish education system which serves over 16,000 students from nursery to grade twelve.

Among Rabbi Witty's more widely acclaimed accomplishments are the creation of the Orah School for Jewish Children from the Soviet Union, the She'arim Hebrew Day School for Children with Learning Disabilities and the highly successful Midrasha L'Morim teachers training program.

But perhaps Rabbi Witty's greatest contribution to community was his success in building bridges across religious affiliations, which cultivated a climate of cooperation within the Jewish education community. "We're all Jews working towards the same ultimate goals," says Witty.

For more information about the tribute dinner, please call the Board of Jewish Education at (416) 633-7770.

HOENLEIN OUTLINES DANGERS OF DISUNITY

One of American Jewry's most influential leaders believes Jews should invest more energy in battling external enemies than in fighting each other.

Malcolm Hoenlein, Executive Vice-Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, recently told close to a hundred UJA Federation volunteers, "the most important lesson of Jewish history is Jewish unity."

Hoenlein spoke strongly against placing too much emphasis on differences between Jewish people and too little on commonalities in the wake of religious conversion legislation before the Knesset. A bill formalizing the existing practice of recognizing only conversions performed by the Israel Chief Rabbinate has received first reading. Those who were converted outside Israel would not be affected. A tentative compromise has been reached, satisfying Conservative and Reform movement leaders who strongly oppose the legislation.

"When the world sees Israelis divided among themselves, they take advantage and run a Mack truck through us," Hoenlein warned. "We cannot allow ourselves to be diverted and pitted against one another."

Hoenlein, whose office coordinates the activities of 53 major Jewish agencies in the U.S., pointed to the dangers posed by rising international terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism.

Malcolm Hoenlein

"We are seeing today echoes from the 7th century when the sword of Islam spread across Europe," cautioned Hoenlein, adding that "Iran has the ability to hit targets in all of Europe and the Middle East and soon it will have the ability to hit North America."

"There are too many issues clouding what's important because we are too busy fighting each other. Your grandchildren are going to look back and judge you if you do not speak out against intolerance among our own people," said Hoenlein. "There is no cloak of ignorance that can hide our shame."

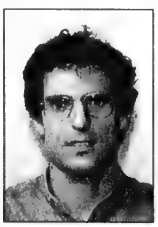
"The UJA Federation Campaign," he stressed, "is the most unifying factor in the Jewish community. Now, more than ever, people need to feel like they belong."

ALIYA CENTRE STRESSES JOBS

The Israel Aliya Centre in Toronto has been organizing innovative programs to help new olim find what they need most — a job.

While the Centre, supported by the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency, offers new immigrants to Israel a wide range of services and information on making aliya, Director Miri Gur says "helping people find employment is probably the most important assistance we can provide."

A recent job fair in Toronto, sponsored by the Jewish Agency and Israel's Ministry of Absorption, was very successful in attracting and recruiting olim who want to work in Israel's booming hi-tech sector. It was the first time recruiters visited Toronto to interview perspective employees.



Uri Postavsky

The fair, which was also held in New York and Los Angeles, brought representatives from Israel's leading firms, such as Intel and Digital.

Corporate interviewers talked to 60 people during the two-day fair, resulting in several job offers. Dr. Shimon Aamar, Director of Personnel for Intel was impressed with the "high quality of candidates to choose from."

Computer software engineer Uri Postavsky says finding the right job for both his wife and himself determined whether the two, along with their three children, would move to Israel. Uri, who received four employment offers from different hi-tech companies, accepted a position with Digital's Jerusalem office and is now in Israel searching for a place to live.

Uri's wife, Claire Coire, a pathologist, had a more difficult time, but finally landed a position at a hospital in Petach Tikvah.

Executives from Holiday Inn, one of Israel's largest hotel chains, were also in Toronto recently and recruited five olim. This week, 25 candidates for an English teachers retraining program will be interviewed in Toronto.

A Matter of Class

United Congregational Schools is providing Jewish education that's close to home no matter which side of Steeles Avenue students live on.

Established in 1974 following the amalgamation of the Beth Emeth and Beth David synagogue afternoon schools, UCS currently runs one of its two weekly supplementary classes from Beth David in North York and the other from Westminster Public School in Thornhill.

"Since many of our students and their families began moving north, we thought it would be more convenient to hold the mid-week class close to where they live," explains UCS Principal Gella Weiss. Alternatively, students who live in North York attend the Thursday class at Beth David on Yeomans Road. The split, which is almost equal among the 150 students from Junior Kindergarten to grade 7, also reduces class size to a manageable 12-15 students, which Weiss says benefits the kids and makes it easier on the teachers.

Over the years, UCS has held classes in northeast public schools to service the Bayview-Leslie area Jewish population.

Once a month, on Sundays, in addition to regular music lessons and library visits for younger pupils, all the students meet at Beth David for school-wide programming. Last year, students celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut by re-enacting the 1947 U.N. vote declaring the State of Israel. "It created a lot of excitement because this exercise made the historic event very real for all the children," Weiss notes.

Sunday programming for the older students also includes tours of old Jewish Toronto, Hebrew calligraphy lessons and a regular curriculum which includes prayer study, Jewish history, language and Bible study.

Supplementary Schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education include:
Adath Israel Religious School, Beaches Hebrew Institute, Beit Rayim, Bet Sefer Solel, Beth Habonim Religious School, Beth Sholom Congregational School, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Beth Tzedec Congregational School, B'nai Shalom Hebrew School, Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, Darchei Noam Hebrew School, Downtown Jewish Community School, Har Tikvah Congregational School, Hillel Children's Workshop, Holy Blossom Religious School, Jewish Russian Centre Hebrew School, Kadima School, Ohalei Yosef Yitzchak, Orah School, Oraynu, Petach Tikvah Talmud Torah, Shaar Shalom School, Temple Emanu-El School, Temple Har Zion School, Temple Kol Ami School, Temple Sinai School, Tikvat Haim, United Congregational Schools, Village Shul, West Toronto Jewish School.

Conservative movement expands university presence

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Many Conservative Jewish youth have spent their school years as active participants in United Synagogue Youth (USY), but until recently there was a dearth of Conservative programs for university-age students.

"We had been content to say, 'Have a wonderful experience [at university]. We'll be waiting for you when you get back'," Richard Moline explained in a phone interview from his Chicago office.

The director of the department of College Outreach/Koach of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Moline was in Toronto recently to meet with lay Conservative leaders and local campus workers including Adam Silver, Canada's first and only Koach fieldworker.

Although Silver has held the Toronto position only a year, Koach has helped with programs at Montreal's McGill University and Halifax's Dalhousie University prior to that, Moline said.

"We are now talking about expanding farther within the Ontario community," he said. "I would like to see us become involved in other parts of the country as well."

Richard Moline

Moline has been affiliated with Koach for the past half-dozen years, since it became active on U.S. campuses.

In the United States, close to 70 campuses have had Koach programs, and Moline estimates up to 200 campuses are connected via e-mail. The department has only four staff people continent-wide (the other two are in Boston and Los Angeles).

This year Toronto's Robyn Fryer, a recent York University graduate in Jewish Studies, will become a Koach fellow in southern Florida, funded in part by a one-year Hillel grant. (see accompanying article)

Koach's goal is to keep students connected to Judaism and the Conservative movement, said Moline, stressing that Koach and Hillel work closely together. "We're not in any type of competitive situation. Toronto [where Silver is based at the Jewish Campus Services (JCS) office] is a very good example. Adam is as much a part of the JCS staff as ours. We work in partnership, really. We are providing the Conservative piece to the Hillel program."

Moline doesn't think denominalization is "a dirty word," he said. "I think diversity can strengthen people."

Moline is pleased with the way Koach is shaping up in Toronto. Programs this year included Shabbat dinners and educational events.

"In Toronto we have a synagogue base [with] ready facilities for programming, and supportive lay and professional leaders," said Moline. "I'm very pleased. I think next year you'll see increased activity and an increased presence on campus."

At his recent meeting with Toronto Conservative leaders, the suggestion was made that each synagogue have a college outreach committee, he reported.

Among local Conservative synagogues pursuing the connection is Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, which has established a separate Koach membership category for 18- to 25-year-olds

"Hopefully the investment we're making now will pay off a few years down the road," Moline said. "We've had a couple of marriages come out of this already."

York grad heads south as Koach representative

By FRANCES KRAFT

Robyn Fryer

TORONTO — Robyn Fryer wants a career as a Jewish community professional and has been accepted into the Jewish Communal Service program at Gratz College in Pennsylvania.

But the 23-year-old graduate of York University has deferred her acceptance to take a one-year position that will give her hands-on experience in her chosen field.

In August, Fryer will become the Florida staff person for Koach, the campus outreach arm of the Conservative movement, with which she was involved as a student here. Her position is partly funded by a Hillel International Jewish Student Corps grant.

In Florida, much of her time will be spent travelling among campuses. She expects to develop programs and services in Miami, her base, as well as in cities like Gainesville and Tampa. She will be Koach's first fieldworker in the area.

Armed with enthusiasm, a new Honors BA in Religious Studies (with a Jewish Studies stream) and a strong background in Jewish community involvement, Fryer says she is ready for her newest challenge.

A graduate of Associated Hebrew Day Schools and Vaughan Secondary School who spent her second undergraduate year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Fryer, a member of Beth Tikvah Congregation, has worked as a United Synagogue Youth adviser at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, volunteered at Holy Blossom's Out of the Cold program for homeless people and won this year's UJA on Campus Award for her volunteer efforts.

Until a recent trip to meet with Hillel staffers based at the University of Miami, Fryer had never been to Florida and didn't know anybody there.

In her new position, she plans to reach out to students through Hillels, synagogues and schools, serving as a resource for the organizations to strengthen student affiliation.

Ambulatory care centre proposed for Branson

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

The fate of Branson Hospital is still up in the air but officials are hopeful that at least an ambulatory care centre and all its outpatient, medical clinic and day surgery services will remain open at the site.

A proposal for affiliation of Branson and Humber River Regional Hospital (formerly York Finch) to operate such a facility is now before the Hospital Services Restructuring Commission that ordered Branson closed by the year 2000 along with 10 other Metro hospitals.

"We met with commission officials and they thanked us for our joint presentation," said Brian Fenton, Branson's senior vice-president. "We expect to get a decision within the next month."

(Humber River Hospital is the result of merging York Finch, Humber and Northwestern Hospitals, with Northwestern to be closed.)

Meanwhile, for Branson, which serves more seniors on a per capita basis than any other Metro hospital, it's business as usual. And that business is a vital concern for the large, elderly Jewish population in the Branson area.

If the commission approves the affiliation as a broad concept, then some transportation plan for patients between Branson and Humber River, at Highway 400 and Finch, may be worked out, Fenton said.

Public transportation between the Branson area and the Humber River Hospital site is a serious problem for family and patients. North York General Hospital to the east has already offered to set up such a service.

The affiliation proposal follows the commission's recommendation that 60 percent of Branson's emergency and medical cases go to Humber River, and 30 percent to North York Central, and also that half its surgical patients go to Humber River and half to North York General.

The commission has allotted funding to Humber River, North York General and York Central in Richmond Hill to handle Branson's patients.

The ambulatory care centre would include an 18-hour walk-in clinic, a whole host of outpatient and diagnostic services, day surgery, cosmetic surgery and short term surgery beds for up to 36 hours care.

In addition, in its own proposal to the commission, Branson is asking that it be allowed to keep 160 beds for respite, transitional and long-term care.

The need for medical services for the 32,000 seniors in the Branson area is so urgent that the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have appealed to the commission to keep Branson open as as an ambulatory care centre, a proposal supported as well by North York General Hospital.

Their appeals said Branson had developed special services and a sensitivity in treating Jewish patients, including a religious chapel. Family and friends can honor the Sabbath by walking to the hospital to see patients.

They also questioned the commission's decision to shut Branson while keeping open Queensway General as an ambulatory care centre even though it does not have as heavy a seniors' case load.

North York Mayor Mel Lastman has been sharply critical of the decision to shut Branson, stating that there will be no savings because of the cost of adding new facilities at other hospitals to care for Branson patients.

Nonagenarian exudes youthful joie de vivre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

Lunch with Max Sharp is an extraordinary experience. At 95, the self-made gentle man has much to teach about business, relationships and his philosophy of life.

From our first greeting to our final good-bye, Sharp exudes his joie de vivre – his youthful perspective on handling day to day problems.

His warm and genial smile and refreshing optimism make time spent with him memorable.

At lunch with his three daughters, Edie Creed, Neddy Levy and Bea Eisen (his son Isadore Sharp was unable to join us), he reads the menu at Oakdale Golf & Country Club without glasses. He says that he also does all of his paper work, as well as the needlepoint he loves, where he "still makes perfect stitches," without glasses.

He believes that his youthful outlook comes from his lifestyle. He does not eat meat, he says.

"Before anything else, at 8 a.m. each morning I begin my day on my treadmill for at least half an hour."

"And he still does push-ups," Creed adds.

Four or five times a week, he lunches and spends the afternoon at Oakdale, where he is greeted by many members and where he spends time kibitzing with friends. On Wednesday, he goes to the office to open his mail and to look after business matters. And almost every Saturday, you will find Sharp at services at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Sharp's philosophy is that you have to keep busy. And if you have a problem, try to deal with it. "If you can't solve the problem, make peace with it."

His wonderful relationship with family, Levy says, has developed because he never tells his children what to do. "But if we ask him for advice," she adds, "he will always help."

When he isn't out and about, you can find Sharp at his needlepoint. "I don't know how many I've made but it is at least 200." Some of his pieces are large and depict Israeli scenes.

He presents them to his family – 19 grandchildren and 35 great-grandchildren – and to his friends.

In 1989, he and his son Isadore were Negev Dinner honorees in recognition of communal leadership and dedicated service to Israel. When he was 90, Sharp received North American recognition when he got a hole-in-one at Oakdale.

Born in Poland, Sharp moved to Israel, then Palestine, in 1920. He worked as a farmer and after one year, realized that this was not for him. He began learning a trade, specializing in plastering and tile work.

In 1925, he immigrated to Canada to join his brother Louis and went to work as a plasterer for $10 a week. He met and married Lena (Lil) Godfrey. When his boss refused to give him a raise, he left and went into business for himself.

He built houses, his wife decorated them and the Sharps moved in until the house was sold.

"We moved many, many times," Eisen says.

Issy joined the business and later they were joined by son-in-law Eddie Creed and friend Murray Koffler. They opened the first Four Seasons Hotel at Carlton and Jarvis in 1961 and the rest is history – Four Seasons became the world's largest operator of hotels and resorts.

Sharp says he had great satisfaction in building a hotel/condominium in Natanya.

But his greatest joy clearly comes from his family. A Passover seder was held in Sharp's apartment with 65 family members attending – a few are away at school. The children helped with the preparations and the highlight was Nanny Lil's southern fried chicken. Eisen says the family prepared 75 pounds of chicken wings and breasts.

Sharp's eyes sparkle as he describes his family. And lunching with him and his three daughters, it is evident that he is very proud of that family.

GRANDPALS PROGRAM

Intergenerational program in Hamilton helps students acquire literacy skills

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

Every Monday afternoon for the last five months, groups of children from junior kindergarten through Grade 5 have walked to Shalom Village, a residence for seniors, and spent an hour doing a pre-planned activity with either a nursing home or an apartment resident.

The students from the George R. Allan Elementary School were participating in the GRANDPALS literacy program. Activities included reading to a resident, reciting poetry, sharing personal experiences, singing or doing crafts together.

The program is the brainchild of kindergarten teacher and part-time librarian Bev Lasky, who wanted to create a meaningful environment where her students could more readily acquire literacy skills.

She approached the school's principal and Shalom Village's executive director, Pat Morden, both of whom were enthusiastic. They also discovered that they had a number of complementary goals.

The school was looking for ways to give their students a platform for literacy and to increase their social skills through outreach to the community. Shalom Village wanted to increase contact between residents and community members and to give their residents an opportunity to form relationships with children.

As the program developed, teachers and parents became involved, creating a true community partnership.

The culmination of the five-month program recently took place at the seniors' residence in a ceremony honoring participating residents and children. Students worked with Lasky on the format, planning the program and writing their own speeches.

During the celebration, Morden announced that a photograph of George R. Allan student Mathew Kang and resident Jack Shapiro had been submitted to a contest sponsored by the nationally published Journal of Long-Term Care. She had recently been informed that the photo had received first prize and would be featured in the fall issue.

One student began the ceremony with some personal reminiscences of initial hesitancies. "The first time, we were nervous and scared."

Other students spoke about their evolving discoveries.

"We learned a lot from each other. And every time we said goodbye," one student said, "we always got a little surprise.

"Regardless of how old or young we are, we can always learn from each other."

Then, it was time for the seniors to show their appreciation. A trio of seniors sang a medley of Yiddish songs for their guests. After that, one of them thanked the children.

Families remain key care-givers for the aged

By PHYLLIS FIEN MSW
Special to the CJN

The family serves as the primary support system for the aged, who may need help with the dependencies that come with aging, increasing frailty, illness and/or impairment. Spouses, adult children of aging parents and siblings play an important role in providing care.

Analysis

Research shows that family members are highly responsible individuals who provide substantial physical, emotional, social and economic support to elderly relatives and that family caregiving to these relatives has become a normal experience for many.

The caregiving situation begins with the aged person's need for assistance. It cannot be defined by any one specific set of tasks. It is multi-faceted and varies widely, depending on needs and the nature and intensity of family responsibility.

Eldercare may range from occasional errands to around-the-clock personal and health care for the bedridden. It may continue even after institutional placement.

• Demographic impact: Demographic trends show that the number of aged is expected to increase substantially in the next few decades. There has already been an increase in the average lifespan in the past century and by 2025, more than 20 percent of Canada's population will be 65 or over.

This trend is the result of increasing longevity owing to better health care, decreasing death and infant mortality rates and higher standards of living. This growth, especially as the baby boomers age, will continue to have implications for the aged, the families who care for them and the need for sufficient and effective services and programs for supporting family care. Clinical researchers have concluded that eldercare can be both physically and emotionally stressful.

The caregiver's experience and degree of stress varies with the nature and degree of disability, the characteristics of the caregiver, external and internal resources and supports available, and other variables. So in order to meet the needs of the aged, it will become necessary to help the caregivers to facilitate, enhance, support and validate their experience.

This will become increasingly necessary given government policies favoring deinstitutionalization and keeping the aged at home, particularly in view of the National Advisory Council on Aging's 1986 estimate that 70 to 80 percent of home healthcare comes from a spouse or adult children.

•Who cares? Research shows the elderly choose supports from their family. If a spouse or child is not available, they will turn to siblings, grandchildren, cousins, friends and neighbors before using community resources.

Spouses usually provide the most extensive, comprehensive caring for the most disabled elderly, suggesting they tolerate greater levels of disability than other caregivers. Females predominate as primary caregivers. Because women tend to outlive men, the usual caregiver for an older man is his elderly wife; for an older woman, it is her adult daughter, who is often facing competing responsibilities from family and employment.

Caregiving tasks: The nature and number of caregiving tasks performed and time committed also varies; involvement may increase to meet needs as they arise. Emotional support, the most universal caregiving task, is considered by caregivers as the most important, regardless of time spent on tasks like housework, laundry, meal preparation, transportation, home maintenance, bathing, feeding or other physical tasks.

The caregiving experience: How eldercaring is experienced by and impacts on family caregivers is complex and influenced by many variables. Spouses appear to be the highest risk group for caregiver stress and burden. Adult children are vulnerable as a generation in the middle with competing demands on time and energy, often giving up opportunities for socialization, leisure and vacations.

Caregivers of physically and emotionally frail elders may feel guilt, resentment, low morale, physical and

Club members becoming computer literate

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

The world of electronic communication has been opened up to an enthusiastic group of seniors who are taking lessons at Baycrest's Wagman Centre Computer Club, a program of the centre's Wellness Group.

Four recently installed computers in the centre library are used by the members, most of whom have never used a computer before.

The computers were donated to Baycrest by the David and Vivian Campbell Family Foundation. Their son Henry Campbell, president of Toronto-based Perceptix Inc., is volunteering his time to teach at the computer club.

At a recent class, Jim MacMillan, president of the Wellness Group told The CJN he had never used a computer, "but I think it is important for seniors to keep abreast of new technology as much as possible."

He said everybody in his family, three daughters, eight granddaughters and one grandson, are all computer literate.

"I will be able to communicate with them more often now," he said, as he prepared an e-mail.

"I am enjoying it very much. Henry Campbell has been exceptional. You have to be a special person to take the time and have the patience to teach us. It is an excellent service he and his family have rendered to us."

Dr. Paul Bailey, a retired anesthesiologist, says he had never been on a computer before, "but if I get interested enough, I will get a computer at home."

He explained that he is interested in accessing the Web. "It is of interest to me and partly educational. I will be able to hook up to art galleries and museums and see what is at any gallery in the world.

"Even the Queen has a Web page," he said jokingly, "so I can even see what royalty has."

Vera Houzer said she has felt illiterate "when other people speak to me about computers; it is a complete blank."

Now she is learning the terminology and said she will be writing to three friends with e-mail addresses.

"I see how young people send messages worldwide and it would be nice if I want to write to someone or I want to get information, at least I will have the knowledge."

Bernice Krieger became interested in the computer when her 4-year-old grandson in Vancouver taught her how to use the mouse to play Lion King games.

Krieger, who volunteers in the arts and crafts department is delighted that she will now be able to communicate with her children in Vancouver and Barrie.

"In the world today," she said, "I feel that every person should have some knowledge of computers."

As we spoke, Krieger was composing an e-mail message to her daughter-in-law in Vancouver, beginning, "This is my first e-mail letter to you..." She continued with a newsy rundown of the week's events.

Anne Remmel, Baycrest's education director, said she thinks the computer program 's a wonderful opportunity to make this technology useful to the centre's members and clients.

"The members are so excited about being able to send messages electronically and they are getting comfortable with computers."

It is evident that Henry Campbell is enjoying his new teaching challenge.

"I think that the members are keen and can really appreciate the communication tool they have here, whether they are writing to a person across the street, a grandchild in Halifax or a son in Israel."

LIFE Institute provides mental stimulation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Jack Brown is one of about 500 seniors who actively participates in a self-directed education program at Ryerson Polytechnic University.

Founded in 1990 with 30 like-minded individuals, LIFE Institute (Learning is Forever) has attracted a growing number of retirees, age 55 and over.

"We have an autonomous group of seniors who wish to fulfil their needs for friendship, interaction and mind stimulation," says Brown, 71, who served as president of the institute (1995-96) and is presently head of long range planning.

"The members are people who are devoted to the pursuit of lifelong learning."

The courses, which are offered throughout the year, cover a range of topics – creative writing, dreams, performing arts, wellness, literature, biography and even a series titled Old Age Isn't for Sissies.

Guest lecturers from the university provide up-to-date developments and theories about the community, politics and historical issues.

As well as lecture series, the group holds conferences, museum visits with lectures, theatre parties, nature walks, travel information and special events.

The annual membership fee entitles participants to take courses led by skillful volunteer moderators and to participate in the other activities that are constantly being expanded.

Jack Brown

Brown, who operated a retail mens and ladies wear store in Brantford, sold his business in 1989. He moved to Toronto where his three daughters and nine grandchildren live. His son and three children live in California.

"I had no idea of what I was going to do after I retired," he said.

"When the LIFE Institute was in formation by superannuated teachers of North York, my friend Fran Gruber, who was the founding president, suggested I come to the inaugural meeting. I felt that this was an opportunity for me to become involved with something challenging – education."

Brown explained that everyone at LIFE learns from everyone else. The members suggest the topics. "The courses have broadened my knowledge in fields I wouldn't have normally sought. It has stimulated my curiosity along paths I had not travelled." He adds that it has also given him an opportunity to meet many interesting people.

About the book...
While the shock of Auschwitz contrasts sharply with Raab's idyllic life prior to internment, it is in the images of life after liberation that she imparts her most poignant story.

From the critics...
"Elisabeth M. Raab's haunting, terse, and beautiful memoir seeks not to impress the reader with all she has seen or heard of the momentous events of her life; but with what she has seen fit to take away....This is unforgettable writing...."
– Norman Doidge, Books in Canada

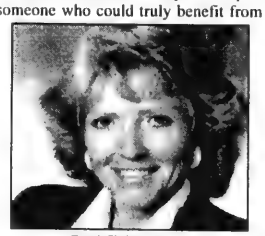
Dispelling the Myths of Reverse Mortgages

The public is exposed to a tremendous amount of misinformation about the reverse mortgage according to Carol Christopherson, spokesperson of the Canadian Home Income Plan™ (CHIP™), "Obviously that's frustrating for us as the creators of the program, but more important it is unfair on consumers," says Christopherson. "if someone who could truly benefit from the reverse mortgage doesn't do it because they have been given wrong information, they may end up compromising their retirement lifestyle quite unnecessarily."



Carol Christopherson
Spokesperson
Canadian Home Income Plan™ Corp.

The reverse mortgage was designed by the Canadian Home Income Plan™ Corporation in 1986 to provide Canadians over the age of 62 with a unique financial opportunity. Through CHIP™ they were able to access some of the substantial equity that had built up in their homes. Over the past ten years, thousands of eligible homeowners have taken advantage of the program to enhance their lifestyles and assist their children with financial goals.

The most popular use of CHIP™ can be grouped under the category of "Lifestyle." Vacations, home renovations or a new car would all fit in here along with home help which could be anything from a gardener once a month to 24-hour-a-day nursing care.

"What's important for a people to realize is that this is not a program of last resort or one that only fits for a low income group," says Christopherson. "We have many quite wealthy people who use the program for financial and estate planning. This enables people to pass on a portion of their children's inheritance to them at an earlier date when they are probably more in need."

CHIP is known as a reverse mortgage because no repayments are required on the capital advanced during the homeowner's lifetime. Instead, the principal plus interest is repaid all at once from the estate. This leaves the homeowner to enjoy the full benefits during their lifetime knowing that it does not require repayment until they die. Security and flexibility issues have also been addressed as these are extremely important concerns to both the homeowner and the Canadian Home Income Plan. "Our primary objective at CHIP™ is to educate people about the CHIP™ reverse mortgage. Retired people have spent many hours learning about RRSP options, annuities, mutual funds, government benefits and other retirement income options; they owe it to themselves to invest a little time learning about CHIP™."

For details of CHIP's upcoming seminars or an information package, they can be reached at (416) 925-2447 or 1-800-563-2447 or by writing to #1108-30 St. Clair Ave. W., Toronto, ON M4V 3A1.

LIFE Institute program provides friendship and stimulation

Recently, IBM donated four state-of-the-art computers to Ryerson for the exclusive use of LIFE members. The computers come with laser and color printers, photo scanners, sound and a variety of software programs, including access to the Internet – e-mail and Web sites.

"We believe that a very large number of our members would like to have computer skills, and even suggest that all our members should have computer skills in order to keep up with the direction that our society seems to be heading and in order to keep up with our children and grandchildren."

The instructional courses will include word processing, Quicken, Lotus, graphics and Internet access.

"We're looking to form a round table club that might meet once a month to brag about different Web sites or talk about new technology."

He says LIFE could have it's own Internet Web sites on which all activities, curriculum and other information could be listed.

Geoff Arnold, president of the institute notes that the membership is diverse and includes people of various races and cultures. He says that this year, 25 courses were offered and along with the computer programs, more courses will be added this fall.

At My Age*, an Intergenerational Photography project by seniors and preschoolers. The book is a collection of photos taken during a 12-week program at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. It was edited and designed by Wendy Rosen.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A recently published book, At My Age, is an intergenerational photography project of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"Bringing seniors and children together enriches the lives of both groups," says Moshe Greengarten, Baycrest's vice-president of public and community affairs.

Teams comprised of a senior (one man was 91 years old), preschoolers 3½ to 5½ years old from the on-site Esther Exton Child Care Centre, and a volunteer who assisted with age or health-related problems, worked together. The quotations accompanying the photographs are by the children.

In a 12-week program, the teams met to discuss various aspects of photography. They were assigned a topic based on the week's lesson and then went out to take the pictures. The next week's session began with a critique of the previous week's assignment.

Young and old

Those involved in the project discovered there is a natural chemistry between young and old. Several of the seniors said they felt the program gave them a "reason to get up in the morning."

The children also reacted with enthusiasm and as the weeks progressed, they and the seniors bonded. It wasn't unusual to see a child relinquish a favorite toy to the senior partner so that the youngster could push a wheelchair or assist the senior.

"Our plans for the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged includes a children's play room on each residential floor. This will encourage children to visit and will provide an environment for interaction between the generations," says Greengarten who wants to encourage more such programs.

At My Age is available at Baycrest, synagogue gift shops, Judaica stores and the Art Gallery of Ontario.

Families remain key care-givers for the aged

emotional exhaustion. Fatigue, marital and family conflict and embarrassment are found to be frequent consequences of caring for a person who is suffering, and as the elder's level of functional or mental impairment increases, so too does amount of assistance provided and degree of stress experienced.

Family caregivers may feel a sense of grief about losses experienced – of a spouse or parent they once knew or of a personal relationship – as a result of Alzheimer's disease bringing diminished mental, physical and social functioning. Continued care of such a person without relief or hope of possible changes can lead to feelings of helplessness and emotional exhaustion.

The thought of placing a family member in an institution may evoke guilt and anxiety relating to impending separation and death. Caregivers of those with illnesses such as cancer may suffer from the stress of uncertainty, never sure of the course of the illness, with every remission bringing hope and every exacerbation adding to the fear of death.

Caregiving may also have positive results. It may result in an improved relationship with and understanding of the aging relative, relief that the older relative is properly cared for, satisfaction and self respect knowing that one is successfully fulfilling a responsibility and coping with a personal challenge. Perhaps most importantly, caregivers become role models for their own children.

Enhancing family caregiving capacity: Strengthening and enhancing caregiving of families for the elderly can be achieved through a variety of interventions, programs and services. Some of these include:

1. Programs for the frail elderly to reduce caregiver burden, such as daycare or respite. These provide specific services to the aged emphasizing socialization and activities appropriate to the functional status and care plan, and a safe place so the caregiver can temporarily be relieved.

2. Information programs, discussion and counselling aiming to inform caregivers/ increase knowledge about available community and government services and programs and how to access and use them, thus lessening the burden and increasing capacity to function effectively.

3. Visiting home, nursing health aid, physiotherapist, occupational therapist for medical rehabilitation and monitoring; visiting a homemaker.

4. Individual and family counselling and support to enhance caregiver and family coping, and dealing with a wide constellation of issues, concerns and situations, relating to:

-aging, declining health, specific illnesses, increasing frailty and cognitive impairment.

-losses, related grief, stress, sadness, guilt, frustration, anger, anxiety, helplessness and burden.

-impact of changes in the biological, psychological and social functioning of the aged individual on the caregiver, other family members and the family system, as well as the need for the family and aged member to understand the meaning of the changed condition and its implications including adaptation to a new reality.

5. Self help groups and programs for spouses/ adult children of aging parents can provide information about the family member's condition and provide a supportive environment.

Phyllis Fien is a social worker (with training in family therapy) in private practice in Toronto doing clinical work with families and individuals and some consultative work with organizations. She has a special interest in the aged and family caregiving. She is a member of the Committee on Aging of the Ontario Association of Social Workers and serves on the association's board of directors.

New Alternative in Health Care

A new health care provider has opened its doors to the multicultural communities of the Greater Toronto Area. Meridian Health Care is an innovative professional services and consulting company that meets all of its clients' health care needs and lightens the load for their personal or institutional caregivers.

A critical aspect of Meridian's health care delivery is having hand-picked staff who are sensitive to the clients' cultural backgrounds.

"We work very hard to match caregivers to the culture, customs and language of each client," said Dr. Mickey Ostro, MD, FRCP, Meridian's Medical Director. "This is a real advantage for the clients, because these can otherwise be serious barriers to good communication and delivery of quality health care."

There is an urgent and growing need for such culturally sensitive services, as the Canadian population expands and ages. Meridian works with each client and his or her family and physician. This process may include assigning each client a Personal Health Care Manager who provides regular updates on the client's health status to his personal physician.

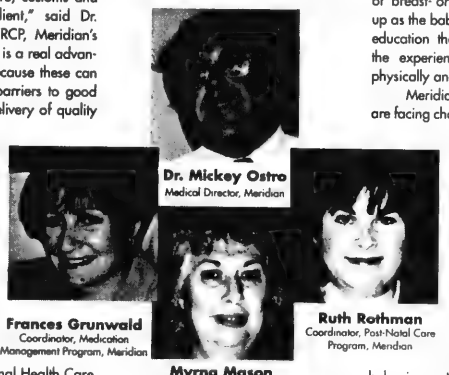
"We do more than meet the physical needs of the client, we take care of the emotional, social, psychological and cultural considerations as well," said Myrna Mason, BScN, RN, Meridian's Director of Programs and Client Services. "People in Toronto need to have options for meeting all of their health care needs. And Meridian provides many of those options."

A Meridian Personal Health Care Manager is available to each client and performs a comprehensive, in-home assessment of his or her health care needs. Every aspect of the client's health care delivery is carefully supervised, resulting in an efficient and effective service that is beneficial to the client and provides cost-savings to the health care system.

These multiple benefits accrue from all of Meridian's services, including its Medication Management Program. In Canada, elderly people are often hospitalized because of improper use of medications. People over 75 take an average of seven medications a day, as well as other over-the-counter products. Frances Grunwald, a clinical pharmacist and director of the Medication Management Program, stresses the importance of coordinated, compassionate care and communication.

"Meridian's approach to health care is unique; we aim to deliver this program in the home, where the needs of the client can be assessed in the context of their living environments," she said.

The goal is to ensure there are no drug duplications or adverse interactions as a result of the clients' visiting different physicians and having prescriptions filled at different pharmacies. The clients receive education, and strategies to ensure that they take their pills at the right times and that there is proper communication between themselves and their physicians and pharmacists.



Another condition that is very costly to Canadians is urinary incontinence. It affects six percent of the population, or about 1.6 million people, and is estimated to cost society $1 billion a year. It is most common in the elderly. The personal and embarrassing nature of this problem prevents all but one in 12 of those affected from seeking necessary medical help. The rest are left with large financial, social and psychological burdens.

Meridian has developed a Continence Rehabilitation Program to ease these burdens. A specialized nurse certified in the management of bladder and bowel incontinence assesses the client and assists him or her in obtaining the best possible care. "The Continence Rehabilitation Program is cost-effective and has a high rate of success in allowing clients to return to their normal lifestyles," said Penny Parker, BA, RN, CURN, the program coordinator. The program is already being implemented in a Metro institution for the elderly.

New mothers and their babies also require special care, particularly with the quick-discharge policy many hospitals and birthing centres now have in place. In response, Meridian has developed a Post-Natal Care Program, which is coordinated by Ruth Rothman, BScN, RN, CPIC. The Post-Natal Care Program begins within 24 hours of the discharge of the mother and new baby and includes an assessment of them by a nurse, monitoring of the effectiveness of breast- or bottle-feeding and follow-up as the baby grows. The support and education the mother receives makes the experience easier for her, both physically and emotionally.

Meridian also helps families who are facing challenges at the other end of the lifecycle: nurses who specialize in geriatrics are available to clients and their families. They and other Meridian health care professionals offer respite for caregivers, chronic pain management, and other services such as nutritional counselling and strategies to deal with cognitive impairment or aggressive behaviour. Meridian also delivers active and compassionate therapies to clients with terminal illnesses and their families. The Palliative Care staff provide comfort and assistance in a manner that is sensitive to the clients' physical and psychological needs, as well as to their social and religious values.

Meridian's services are delivered by a team of highly qualified professionals who are all in good standing with their respective professional bodies. These include psychologists, pharmacists, registered nurses, registered nursing assistants, occupational therapists, recreational therapists, physiotherapists, speech and language pathologists, dietitians, podiatrists and chiropodists. This Health Care Team is headed by Dr. Ostro and a Medical Advisory Board that continuously monitor and upgrade Meridian's policies and procedures. The principals of Meridian have a wide range of experience in community- and home-based care throughout Canada and the United States.

"Our aim is to provide Canadians with the best and most innovative personal health services today and into the 21st century," said Dr. Ostro. "And we have the experience and the staff to accomplish that."

Montreal CJN wins award

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal edition of The CJN won a certificate of excellence as Best Overall Specialty Newspaper by the Quebec Community Newspapers Association (QCNA) at its annual awards night this month in Ste. Anne de Bellevue.

Judge Ashok Chandwani, an assistant managing editor at the Gazette, deemed The CJN, a "readable, well laid-out newspaper with wide-ranging coverage of local and international Jewish issues."

"It's always nice to be recognized by your peers," she said.

Wolman took note of the fact that The CJN had never previously been eligible for a QCNA award for the simple reason that the "specialty" category never existed before this year.

The vast majority of QCNA newspapers are geography-based, but this year the QCNA created the "specialty" category for Quebec publications that target specific "demographic" groups.

The other entries in the specialty category included Montreal Community Contact, a publication of Quebec's black and Caribbean communities; the Senior Times; and the Quebec Farmers' Advocate.

The QCNA also hands out its most prestigious writing and newspaper awards to publications that appear to win year after year.

This year, the top three prizes went to the Stanstead Journal, the Chronicle and the Westmount Examiner.

Deputy PM 'Gray Herb' Chretien's new gatekeeper

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

OTTAWA — There was a very prominent yarmulke at the recent swearing-in of Jean Chrétien's new-look cabinet.

It rested on the recently re-follicled head of Herb Gray, the veteran Windsor MP who was named to the prestigious position of deputy prime minister.

It is the highest elected position in the federal government ever attained by a Jew in Canadian history.

But Jewish political firsts are nothing new to Gray, now the longest serving member of Parliament, first elected in 1962 and returned in every subsequent national vote.

"I was the first Jewish cabinet minister when I was initially appointed to the cabinet in 1969 by Pierre Elliot Trudeau," said the 66-year-old Gray, dubbed "Gray Herb" around here for his uncanny ability to stand for hours in front of the television cameras and say little, if anything.

"Before that, when I was parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance, as far as I'm aware, it was the first time somebody Jewish was a parliamentary secretary.

"It's a great challenge and an honor as well. It's an honor to be in cabinet in any position. After all, only about 30 people out of 30 million have the opportunity. But to be deputy prime minister and to develop the role is really something exciting."

The exact scope of Gray's new role as second-in-command to the prime minister has yet to be defined.

He replaces Sheila Copps, whose duties as DPM, as the job was called in the bureaucratic ranks, were pretty much limited to filling in for Chrétien in cabinet and the House of Commons during his absences and at funerals in far-away lands.

But unlike Copps, who was also heritage minister, Gray will be the first full-time deputy prime minister with no other ministerial responsibilities.

It is expected he will serve as a gatekeeper to Chrétien ("You wanna see him, you gotta see me first."), a sounding board, a senior adviser and overall conciliator.

"I'll be assisting the prime minister in the overall work of coordination and management of the government. I'll be helping coordinate what the government does in terms of administration, policy development and legislation."

Gray has recently fought a battle with cancer – he lost his hair due to chemotherapy and once joked he was trying to copy the Bruce Willis look — but insists he's up to the new job.

"The doctors say I'm okay. I have to be checked every couple of months, but since early last fall, they've given me good reports. If I didn't feel up to it, I wouldn't be doing it.

"I've just come through a very active election campaign in which I was not only going door to door, but was at the factory gates at 6 in the morning. I'm really energized and looking forward to the challenge."

When he took his oath of office at Rideau Hall, he was sworn in using the same Bible his mother-in-law bought at Rodal's and schlepped to Ottawa by bus years ago, when he discovered parliamentary staff only had a Christian Bible.

"I'm in government as a Canadian. I'm there to work on behalf of my constituents, but also on behalf of all Canadians. I am very conscious and proud of my Jewish heritage and take an interest in issues of concern to the Jewish community. The Jewish biblical teachings with regards to social justice have always been very important to me.

"But I'm there as a Canadian cabinet minister, elected by a largely non-Jewish population of Windsor West. I'm there to work for all Canadians. I'm certainly accessible to Jewish community organizations who want to talk to me or want me to come to their events. Certainly I want to make sure their points of view aren't overlooked."

Despite Gray's elevation, the Jewish presence in the cabinet has actually slipped a notch from when the Liberals first came into office in 1993.

Veteran Montreal MP Sheila Finestone was secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women during the first mandate but was dumped during a mid-term shuffle.

Finestone was re-elected June 2, easily defeating English rights crusader and all-around political gadfly Howard Galganov, but was not reappointed to cabinet.

When the House of Commons returns to work in September, there will be three new Jewish faces, all Liberal:

• Elinor Caplan — The former Ontario health minister was one of three candidates hand-picked by Chrétien without going through the normal nomination process. She had been seen as a virtual shoo-in for a cabinet post but apparently got edged out by an excess of Ontario ministers.

• Raymonde Folco — A former member of the Immigration and Refugee Board, the Paris-born Folco was chair of the Conseil des Communautés Culturelles et de l'Immigration, a Quebec government advisory body. She was an officer-at-large of the Quebec region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

• Jacques Saada — Born in Tunisia, Saada was a consultant to the federal government on international development and has been a teacher, school administrator and ran a translation company. He is a former president of the the federal Liberals' Quebec wing.

At one point in the last Parliament, there were five Jewish MPs, but David Berger left to become Canada's ambassador to Israel and Barry Campbell, a promising rookie who was parliamentary secretary to Finance Minister Paul Martin, did not seek re-election.

Overhaul urged for refugee law

ROBERTA STALEY
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — A court decision allowing Jewish refugees to enter Canada highlights the need for an immigration overhaul, says a Vancouver academic.

"In the current legislative milieu, refugee claimants get short shrift," said Dr. Don DeVoretz, co-director of the Centre for Excellence on Immigration and Integration at Simon Fraser University. "They should be under a ministry that understands what is going on in their country."

He was responding to a decision last month by the Federal Court of Canada that Jews cannot be denied the right to seek refugee status in this country solely because they are eligible for citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

The court ruling overturned a decision last year by Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board that denied refugee status to a Ukrainian Jew, Lioudmila Katkova. Officials rejected Katkova on the grounds she could automatically be granted citizenship in Israel under the Law of Return.

Justice William McKeown ruled that the law only applies to those who express a desire to settle in the Jewish state. He said the IRB panel had ignored evidence that Katkova did not want to go to Israel. Her husband is not Jewish, she has family here and she feared terrorist attacks.

Immigration board general counsel Philip Palmer said from Ottawa that McKeown's decision will be considered precedent-setting.

DeVoretz said the Katkova case indicates the immigration board does not look properly into individual refugee cases.

"The best thing to do is base the refugee appeal upon the safety and welfare of the individual," he said.

DeVoretz also said Canada should stop putting limits on the number of refugees allowed into the country each year.

"We have quotas here on the number that we take. How do we know what the world circumstance is going to be like?"

Refugee claimants become part of the total number of new citizens granted admissions every year. And criteria which apply to immigrants are also applied to refugees. For example, refugees tend to be accepted in greater numbers if they speak English and are able to integrate into Canada easily, DeVoretz said. "The refugee selection criteria leave people in very perilous situations."

Canada allows between 200,000 and 250,000 new Canadians into the country annually. Between 20,000 and 30,000 of those are refugees.

DeVoretz said Canada should be flexible enough to take in larger numbers of refugees during times of crisis. "What happens if something goes wrong in Hong Kong?" he asked, referring to the country's imminent takeover by China.

The Liberal government is looking into alternatives to current immigration legislation. Ottawa has appointed three people, including Susan Davis, a former national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, and Vancouver's Roslyn Kunin of the Laurier Institution, to make recommendations by the end of this year. The group is also looking at the possibility of splitting the administration of refugees and immigration.

"We haven't made any final decisions yet," said Kunin, whose non-profit think tank looks at the economic and social implications of cultural diversity.

Vancouver federation faces criticism from regions

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — If Jonathan Berkowitz had his way, volunteers, especially in the senior age group, would be pouring off the rafters at the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver. But that's not the case, and it has put the federation in a bind.

"[An] interesting challenge in the Vancouver community is that our organizations have a younger leadership than most other communities. [In] how many other places would the federation president be 41?" he asked, referring to his own situation.

"In other communities I would be chairing a division of campaign, I wouldn't be the president of the whole organization."

Between 300 and 600 people volunteer for the federation in areas such as canvassing, organizing events or participating on various committees. Most are in their early 20s to late 30s, he said.

Though Federation is glad to have many younger volunteers who will grow with the organization, Berkowitz added, those people may not be ready or appropriate to take on leadership roles.

"When you're looking for a campaign chair, the link between generations would be easier and their image within the community would probably be better if it was a senior community member," he said.

One reason for the difference in Vancouver's volunteer demographics, Berkowitz suggested, might be the type of migration into the community. "We have a very different makeup than other communities," said Berkowitz. "There isn't that sense of rootedness and [desire] to put [something] back into the community you grew up in."

'It's a one way street'

Many people in outlying areas such as Burnaby, Coquitlam, New Westminster, White Rock, Richmond and the North Shore, however, feel that disenchantment with the federation has led to a reduction in participation, both in terms of donating money as well as volunteerism.

"Federation has been inclusive in their rhetoric about the regionality of our community but in terms of programming and funding, they've really been almost absent," said Mark Winston, president of the Burquest Jewish Community Association, which serves about 2,000 Jews in the Burnaby, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and New Westminster areas.

Winston said that although the Burquest community has facilities to accommodate an audience for a speaker or event, activities sponsored by Vancouver's Jewish organizations have never found their way into his community. "They've never had a speaker, no meetings, no programs, absolutely nothing in our area."

Though Winston and others from the Burquest area used to make the trip into Vancouver for meetings and events, "it's a one way street," he said. "There's so little that comes back to our area, we don't feel included in the benefits."

He estimated that 60 percent of the Lower Mainland Jewish community lives outside of Vancouver proper but said a much smaller percentage of federation funding makes its way to the outlying communities.

"Funding the Jewish community centre does not meet out needs," said Winston. "Funding the federation itself does not meet our needs.

"The Walk for Israel [has] never been held outside of Vancouver," Winston pointed out. "Why? You can come up with all sorts of reasons but there's really been a change in this region. People that run the federation are committed to maintaining those core institutions. They have resisted the reality that the institutions no longer serve the majority of Jews in our region."

Miriam Bergson, president of Har-El synagogue in West Vancouver and Shelley Ail, president of Beth Tikvah synagogue in Richmond, agreed there has been a distancing between outlying communities and Vancouver proper.

"In all the years I've been here," said Bergson, a North Shore resident for 15 years, "I have never seen any effort by the community in the city to include the North Shore."

"We don't want to exclude ourselves from the general community but geographically it happens to us," said added. Residents on the North Shore have almost completed the construction of a new synagogue due to open in September.

"We're building a very nice community here," said Bergson.

Residents in Richmond have also taken it upon themselves to build their community with limited participation by Federation.

"They've talked for years about putting satellite offices in the different communities," said Ail. "I think that would make a difference as well. Community-sponsored events should [also] be held in areas other than Vancouver."

Ail added that frustration exists with the federation over how they've been allocating funding from their campaign.

"If you look at how much money is used to fund the campaign plus their staff [and] the overhead of running the federation it's outrageous," Ail said. "No wonder there's no dollars to put back into the community.

"The bottom line is we can get together and talk about the needs of all of these communities forever, but until the federation deals with its own money issues, I don't think anything is going to change," said Ail.

"I guess we're at the point where we've just accepted it and we just have to go on. In spite of the difficulties, the community has grown and prospered and we've learned to do for ourselves, she said."

Drew Staffenberg, executive director of the federation, acknowledged the frustration. "Federation is an imperfect organization, just like any others," he said. "It's new. It's struggling to meet the many demands that it has.

"It's not a matter of malicious intent," Staffenberg said. "It's a matter of resources, time and effort. The reality is, there aren't a lot of people from the Oak Street corridor or the west side of Vancouver who are going to go out to a meeting in Burnaby. Is it right? Wrong? It just is."

Staffenberg said he hopes people won't begin pointing fingers but will take it upon themselves to develop their communities and have patience. "We'd love to be more out there, absolutely. But we also want to help people help themselves"

Nelson community a 'loose affiliation'

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

NELSON, B.C. — Nestled in the Selkirk Mountains overlooking Kootenay Lake is the town of Nelson, population, 9,500.

The 70 to 100 Jews who live in the area are represented by the Kootenay Jewish Cultural Association (KJCA), formed in the 1970s when Jews began settling in Nelson and the valleys surrounding the town.

Max Davis, a former Chicago resident and a former representative of the KJCA, characterizes the community as a "loose affiliation of Jews."

He said that when he moved to Nelson from the Slocan Valley, just 50 miles north of Nelson several years ago, there was "a smattering of Jewish people around."

Davis met with Jean Gerber, the Canadian Jewish Congress representative who was then responsible for small Jewish communities in British Columbia, to ask for help in promoting cultural Jewish activities.

With the help of Congress, the KJCA brought in the Shalom dancers and Jewish singers such as Batsheva, and sponsored performances of plays by Yiddish writers, as well as organizing various holiday parties. One of the KJCA's most successful events was a costume carnival.

In recent years, however, formally organized activities in the community have been few and far between. There have been no community Passover seders in Nelson since 1986, and events have been limited to a Sukkot gathering in 1994 and a few recent bar mitzvot.

The KJCA recently met to discuss forming an authority to perform Jewish marriages; and the Canadian Jewish Congress sponsored an anti-racism program in nearby Creston and invited members of the Nelson Jewish community to attend.

According to Davis, for those in the community who are more spiritually inclined, "the Spokane community has opened its doors to Jews from our region."

He also estimates that the intermarriage rate is 80 to 90 percent, with the father in most cases being of Jewish descent.

"I have yet to meet any Jews who were born and raised here. Most of the Jews who live here came from big cities and they came here because of the laid-back lifestyle," says Lily Rosenberg, a former native of Toronto and the current representative of the KJCA.

She says she moved away from an organized community "to recreate myself. I felt that I could give something back." She has organized small group gatherings and Passover seders, but nothing formalized. She adds that since a lot of people have families where only one parent is Jewish, "they appreciate any connection to Judaism that they can get."

Nelson Becker, the editor of the Nelson Express, is another local Jew who has contributed to Jewish life in the area. In his capacity as a concert promoter, he has brought Jewish groups such as Toronto's Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band to the town's restored Capitol Theatre, which originally opened in 1927.

While Rosenberg and Davis agree that there isn't a lot of anti-Semitism in the area, Davis' son, Mark, says he feels that "lots of people in the Kootenays downplay their Jewish identity."

Davis adds that while there are Jews in the area who have an awareness of their roots and want to connect, there are others "who don't want to have anything to do with us."

Lock With A Pro — Pre-Lock Security Services

Your home is your castle; and secure property is essential to true peace of mind. But do you have this security? Find out: call Paul Seidman of Pre-Lock Security Services Inc. Seidman, an expert in security, can evaluate your home or business, point out security weaknesses, and offer a complete hardware line that makes them almost impregnable.

For 20 years, Seidman has sold security services; Pre-Lock is his exciting new venture in home and office protection. More and more, householders and businesses realize how commonplace hoodlums attacking electronically-protected as well as unalarmed premises has become. They don't want to risk waiting for police or security guard protection; they want real, physical, immediate security they can count on. Seidman is concentrating on devices and strategies to prevent forced entry into home or office.

Sure, your property has locks; but as a graduate of the Academy of Locksmiths, Seidman knows how ineffective a normal lock or deadbolt is. In seconds, a crook can pick or pry most Toronto home locks. Some can take a few minutes — even if they have to be picked at all, to gain entry.

The main problem with normal household locks, is key control. A 5-digit number on your key can be its code. Knowing the code, any locksmith or convenience store can duplicate a key without having the actual key, so any service person, cleaner, etc., can make a copy. Keys like these keep honest people out — but not criminals. Do you know how many people have keys to your door?

No matter how good you think your alarm is, an intruder with a key can usually get by it; and even if the alarm goes off, all he has to do is wait quietly. The police come; they see no sign of a break-in, and have no key, so they can't enter. They ring the bell; if no one answers, they decide the alarm is false (like 98% of alarms), and leave. The burglar then continues burgling.

Every 4 minutes, a Canadian home is broken into. In Toronto, there's a 1 in 40 average chance of coming home to a robbery-in-progress; and home invasion and forced entry are increasing. The usual entry points are front door, side door, garage, and sliding and basement windows.

Pre-Lock features 3 high-security lock systems: Medeco, Primus and Mul-T-Lock. The Israelis know plenty about security; and Pre-Lock is proud to protect the community with Mul-T-Lock high-security locks from Israel. These are pick-resistant, strong, and key controlled; and their telescopic pin tumbler mechanism gives security other locks only dream of.

Mul-T-Lock's 2" saw-resistant steel bolt penetrates 1" into the heavy-duty reinforced strike, which is fitted with an advanced steel ball mechanism to lock the door to the frame and prevent jimmying. To detach this bolt, a burglar would have to remove the doorframe!

Medeco locks too are pick-resistant, extra-strong and key-controlled. Most pin tumbler locks, deadbolts included, are easy to pick; Medeco's design makes this nearly impossible. Ordinary locks can be drilled or picked through; Medeco's hardened steel inserts resist drilling. And a Medeco key's unique angled cuts can be duplicated only on Pre-Lock's special key cutting machine.

A good lock is part of your protection; but key control is just as important. Pre-Lock's control program discourages unwanted duplication; only your personal keycard with your signature contains the information needed to copy a key; and Pre-Lock's staff will not duplicate your Medeco, Primus or Mul-T-Lock key without this card. Pre-Lock also duplicates, on the spot, high-security keys for luxury cars such as Mercedes, Volvo and Lexus which typically need to be ordered from a car dealer.

Other security devices are: the "Door Guardian", which virtually stops a door from being kicked open while you're home — the most crucial time for family safety. Sliding doors and windows, easily removed for cleaning, are a burglar's favourite entrance; why not get "key locking pins" and "Charlie bars" to shield these doors and windows? Pre-Lock also has a full set of finishes, and can retrofit any lock.

What about alternatives to free-standing safes? Set in concrete, with the advantage of being hidden, floor safes provide excellent fire and burglary protection; and Pre-Lock can customize your safe with a door deposit slot, key locking dial or electronic keypad lock.

Seidman recomends removable basement window bars, so you can leave your home in an emergency, yet enjoy strong defense. He even offers illuminated address numbers, so police, ambulances and firefighters can find your home fast when seconds count, in an emergency.

Pre-Lock is bonded, insured, and a member of the Association of Ontario Locksmiths, CANASA and the Better Business Bureau. NEW HIGH SCHOOL GETS HOLOCAUST COLLECTION

From left, Michael Herman, chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee, presents Stephen Bloom, head of the history department at Westmount Collegiate Institute in Vaughan, and Grade 10 students Natalie Shats and David Major with one of the books donated to the school by the Holocaust Memorial and Education Centre. The collection, 40 books of both fiction and non-fiction, will be used in the school's new Holocaust studies program, which will begin in September. Bloom said it is especially appropriate that the collection came to Westmount, as the school has a large number of Jewish students, many of them grandchildren of survivors. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

Volunteers honored in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The imminent opening of the Asper Jewish Community Campus was very much in the air as the Winnipeg Jewish community honored its own at the third annual Koved Evening on Monday, June 9.

Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) president Larry Hurtig set the tone with his state of the community address. After stressing the importance of volunteerism, he said that the move to the new campus will strengthen the relationship between the WJCC and its major beneficiaries, who will be at the same location.

He also named a number of other programs, including continuity projects, an employment initiative, the persons with disabilities steering committee and the Israel Experience Centre, which combine to make Winnipeg an even more welcoming community.

He reported that five more Argentinian families are expected to settle in Winnipeg by the end of the year, joining the nine families already here. As well, there has recently been an increase in immigration to Winnipeg among Jews from the former Soviet Union.

Hurtig also noted with pride that Winnipeg will be hosting the Canadian Jewish Congress plenary next May (the first time the plenary has been held outside of Toronto or Montreal), as well as the annual meeting of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services on June 22.

He praised Sheldon Berney, president of the board of the new campus, and Marjorie Blankstein and senior community council staff for their efforts in making campus a reality.

"Now that the challenge of campus has been realized," he said, "our new challenge is to plan for the future and find ways to ensure that our young people feel connected to the community and follow in our footsteps. Winnipeg is looked on as a model of volunteerism."

The next speaker, David Sultan, Israel's new ambassador to Canada, making his first visit to Winnipeg, also praised the community. He spoke of Israel's impressive economic growth, the peace negotiations, the relationship between Israel and the rest of the Jewish world and Israel's role in helping to foster Jewish continuity in the Diaspora.

This year, there were nine recipients of the Shem Tov Awards in recognition of volunteers who devote themselves to the betterment of the community through service to their organizations. The honorees were Abe Arnold (Jewish Historical Society); Gertie Begleiter (Board of Jewish Education); Dr. Earl Hershfield (WJCC); Leona Lakser (Jewish Child & Family Service); Laurie Mainster (Asper Jewish Community Campus); Ron Polinsky (CJA); Gordon Pullan Q.C. (Jewish Museum of Western Canada, which is part of the new campus); Phyllis Spigelman (Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre); and Barry Steinfeld (YMHA Jewish Community Centre).

Special presentations were made to the National Council of Jewish Women in recognition of the international organization's 100th anniversary and to CJA campaign co-chairs Sam Guralnick, Barbara Kives and Karyn Lazareck.

As reported earlier in The CJN, the Max Nathanson Young Leadership Award went to Faith Kaplan, the Harry Silverberg Leadership Development Award to Jonathon Kroft, the Max Shore Memorial Award to Nora Kaufman and the Sol Kanee Distinguished Community Service Medal to Gordon Pullan Q.C.

Conversion compromise interim agreement signed

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As of Sunday night, the Reform movement was still trying to convince one of its converts, who had petitioned the High Court of Justice to have the conversion recognized, to withdraw the petition, so that the agreement signed Sunday between the coalition and the Reform and Conservative movements could be implemented without any problems.

Three other Reform converts also had insisted on pressing forward with their petitions, but they agreed to delay them after a personal appeal from coalition chair MK Michael Eitan, who signed the agreement, along with Rabbi Uri Regev, director of the Reform movement's Israel Religious Action Committee, and Rabbi Reuven Hammer, head of the Conservative movement's rabbinical court for conversions in Israel.

The signing took place in the office of Bobby Brown, the prime minister's adviser on Diaspora affairs. In addition, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu signed a letter to the members of the Conservative and Reform movements who had come to meet with him in an effort to stop the passage of the controversial conversion bill, which stipulates that the Chief Rabbinate must validate all conversions to Judaism performed in Israel.

The agreement calls for a seven-person committee, including a representative each from the Conservative and Reform movements, to arrive at a formulation for registering conversions. According to a number of sources, including transport minister Yitzhak Levy, the committee is to be headed by former justice minister Ya'acov Ne'eman.

"I think if there is anyone who can pull the process together, it is probably Ya'acov Ne'eman," Regev said Sunday.

Regev, who added that his movement has great expectations for the success of the committee's deliberations, said he thought it was likely that the High Court would agree to delay its hearings on the issue of conversions in light of the preponderance of petitioners who are asking the court to do so.

Petitions from the State and the Reform and Conservative movements to postpone the case were presented to the High Court Sunday night. It was asked to render a decision on the postponement within 48 hours.

Eitan also agreed that in addition to the seven-person committee, there be a three-person committee appointed to focus on the conversion of adopted children.

Na'amat, which demanded this as a condition for withdrawing its own petition to the High Court on the issue, is to have a representative on that committee, who will also be observer to the other committee.

Thief thwarts terror attack on Israeli beach

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A thief who took an unattended bag from a crowded Tel Aviv beach ended up a hero after he discovered a bomb inside and called police to defuse it.

Motti Ashkenazi, 30, a drug addict who has a criminal record, spotted the bag near a group of children playing at a Tel Aviv beach last Friday.

He took the bag and walked to the stairwell of a nearby apartment building to check its contents.

After he found a cookie container with suspicious wires coming out of it, he called police, who defused the explosives.

Police called the incident an attempted terrorist attack and said Ashkenazi's actions averted a serious disaster. The explosives weighed several pounds and were packed with nails, according to police.

Police were considering whether to give Ashkenazi a certificate of merit, but noted that only the week before he had been charged with a number of criminal offenses, including attempted car theft.

Suspicion aroused

Ashkenazi maintained that he did not steal the bag. When he first spotted the bag, he said, it aroused his suspicion. He said he asked people around him whose bag it was and then took it away from the area to check the contents.

Ashkenazi added that in light of his deeds, he hoped police would make a gesture by clearing his record and helping him complete a rehabilitation program.

Out of concern for a new wave of terrorist attacks in Tel Aviv, roadblocks were placed at entrances to the city to spot-check cars.

Clinton may veto Jerusalem bill

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — President Bill Clinton might veto a foreign aid authorization bill containing provisions on Jerusalem, because they run counter to administration policy, a senior U.S. official said on Friday.

In a formal document sent to the House of Representatives last week, the White House based its objection on its claim that the executive branch alone may set U.S. foreign policy and that Congress is infringing on that responsibility, the official said.

The communication was made after the House passed its bill two weeks ago, but before last week's overwhelming support in the Senate for a similar bill.

The House and Senate bills are similar and include three problematic areas for the administration: The State Department would have to list "Jerusalem, Israel" on the passport of a U.S. citizen born in the city; the Jerusalem consulate would be brought under the aegis of the U.S. embassy; and U.S. documents would list Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

The bills also budget $100 million to move the embassy.

"We have serious concerns with these restrictions on the president's conduct of foreign relations. These three points we think are unconstitutional," the official said.

Warren Christopher, who was then secretary of state, made an identical argument nearly two years ago as Capitol Hill considered a bill to move the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem by May 1999.

The bill ultimately passed, although the administration received concessions allowing it to postpone the embassy's move if it determined such a delay to be in the country's national interest. As evidence of his displeasure, Clinton did not sign the bill, but it became law automatically after 30 days.

The administration's objections to the current bill centre not only on the Jerusalem requirements, but on such unrelated issues as family planning programs and U.S. arrears to the UN, the official stated.

The administration is waiting to see what version emerges from the House-Senate merging of the two bills before deciding what steps to take, the official said.

Builder planning Jewish seniors home in Moscow

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

MOSCOW — Alexander Platonov stands on the sidewalk adjacent to an open, wind-blown field on the outskirts of Moscow. Like many other undeveloped areas of Russia, it is overgrown with brush and covered in rusted out old junk. It doesn't look like much but in his mind's eye, it's a gleaming new home for Moscow's aged Jewish population, a sort of Baycrest Centre east, serving 1,000 people.

So far, it's still just a dream but Platonov, a builder by occupation, is pushing the project among the decision-makers in the Moscow government and with the leadership of the Jewish community in Russia. He's already had a preliminary architect's plan drawn up. He is in the midst of negotiations with the municipal government for final approval of the plan and hopes to begin construction next year, with completion in 2000.

First of a four-part series

Platonov, 55, calls the project the Moscow Jewish Community House (MJCH) and he's promoting it in conjunction with Moscow's main Jewish organization, the Federation of Jewish Organizations, known as the Vaad.

He envisions it as a seniors' residence combined with a medical centre — something completely lacking in the Russian experience. In Moscow, seniors' homes are little more than hotel-style facilities in which elderly Russians, Jews and non-Jews alike, try to make do on meagre pensions and suffer from poor health, isolation and loneliness.

Alexander Platonov

Platonov, who visited the Baycrest Centre during a recent trip to Toronto, believes that duplicating the geriatric centre would be impossible in Russia. Not even the old Soviet party apparatchiks had such a facility at their disposal, he said. But the MJCH will have a synagogue, a cultural centre, a social hall and provide medical care. Most importantly, he said, is trying to emulate the Baycrest staff's caring and accommodating attitude to residents.

In today's Russia, which has vaulted headlong into a rough and tumble version of capitalism, seniors are the country's most disadvantaged group. Most of them, used to the cradle to grave welfare system under communism, are being left behind in the grab for new wealth. With many people in Russia becoming very rich, prices have skyrocketed, putting those on fixed pensions in dire economic straits. Seniors are forced to subsist on meagre pensions of between 250,000 rubles to 1 million rubles a month ($43 for a single person, $175 for two).

As a result, many seniors are living with their families in shared, cramped quarters.

The idea for a seniors' residence has been tossed around for years but little was done about it until Platonov came along and saw it as a way of leaving a lasting legacy to the Jewish community.

Originally named Perelman, Platonov changed his name to avoid anti-Semitic prejudice and to advance his career. Though a communist as a youth, Platonov changed as he grew older. His interest in Jewish culture increased while at the same time "I started noticing the old Jewish people and how hard their lives were.

"I began looking for some contacts in the Jewish community about seven years ago," he said through an interpreter. Three years ago, he met Irina Scherban, executive direction of the Vaad.

Scherban helped direct his energies towards the Jewish community but for Platonov, "things like cultural programs are not for me. I realized I'd have to do a serious project and do something important in my life so people will remember me."

Having worked as a builder in Nizhne Vartovsk in the Tyumen region of Siberia, he had the experience to take on difficult projects. "I started thinking about my place in the Jewish community and I decided to build something, knowing how the Jewish people in Russia live, especially the older ones."

Irina Scherban

Vaad president Michael Chlenov, dean of the Maimonides Academy, enthusiastically backs the project. "I think it's very important," he said. The Vaad has appointed Scherban to serve as its executive director. Rabbi Adolph Shayevich, chief rabbi of Russia has also given the project his support.

Well connected to the Moscow government officials, Platonov received the consent of Mayor Glushkov to proceed. The mayor, Yuri Louzhkov to proceed. The mayor kind person. For him, there's no difference what nationality you are. Unfortunately," he continued, "at the lower level, the attitude towards Jews is very bad."

Despite the roadblocks placed in his way by junior bureaucrats, Platonov has made some headway and was expecting full authorization from the city government to begin the project. That approval was crucial as the land he's chosen is prime real estate, fully serviced, on a transit line and in a good neighborhood.

Platonov expects the capital cost of the project to be approximately $50 million US. He's received pledges for some support from some of the country's nouveau riche and once he has the land locked up, he plans to approach others for contributions. In addition, he hopes to raise funds from expatriate Russians in North America and elsewhere. Platonov expects to raise 25 percent of the costs inside Russia, 75 percent from abroad.

He pitches it to former Russians as a way to help the elderly back at home, many of whom are family members.

Platonov said the MJCH will have a controlling council and all monetary transactions will be transparent. "Everyone will know where the money goes."

He believes that once the project is completed, the governments of Russia and Moscow will underwrite some of the its operating costs. After all, by constructing the home, the Jewish community is easing the burden on those governments, he said.

A second project Platonov is touting is the renovation of an abandoned kindergarten building in the Beskudnikova neighborhood of Moscow. When completed, that building will be home to 312 seniors and will include a hospital offering medical care for ambulatory patients. That project is being geared to service neighborhood residents.

The community would take over the premises and turn it into a seniors' home. When renovated and expanded, it will house 312 people in a facility that includes a hospital that will provide partial medical care for ambulatory patients. Like the larger project, it too has the support of the Vaad and of a prominent rabbi, Zinovy Kogan. That project, which is independent of the first, will cost an estimated $15 to $20 million US to complete.

CJN Staff Reporter Paul Lungen was recently in Moscow at the invitation and courtesy of Alexander Platonov, Canadian businessman Nathan Jacobson and as a guest of the Vaad.

Jewish community waits for change in Hong Kong

For most people, life is good. The standard of living is high and many are able to afford certain luxuries, such as maids and nannies, that would be unaffordable back home. They have good jobs, professional opportunities and a variety of quality schools to choose from, including Jewish day schools.

Though there is a small percentage of permanent Jewish residents in Hong Kong, the community is mostly transient, with most staying between two and 10 years. The greater influx has occurred in the last five years, mostly of young people.

Like other Westerners, Jews come to Hong Kong primarily for economic reasons. Some are professionals unable to find positions in their fields elsewhere. Some are executives sent by large multinational and financial institutions. Others are there to take on government positions. Jewish professionals with jobs specific to East Asia often choose Hong Kong as their home base because of its English-speaking, western style of living and its established Jewish community.

Given the current situation, the pressing question is how the historic transfer of power in Hong Kong will affect the fate of the Jewish community. Some are uneasy about the changes; however, many did not express grave concerns about the future of the Jewish community there or about their personal situations. Overwhelmingly, they feel that Jews will not be singled out for persecution of any sort, as there is historically and currently no anti-Semitism in Hong Kong or mainland China.

Numerous people commented on the similar values and the positive, mutual respect that has historically existed between the Jewish and the Chinese people. Many feel safer living as Jews in Hong Kong than in most other places in the world.

To further the Jewish community's sense of security, according to Dennis Leventhal, an American-born China business development specialist who has lived and worked in the Greater China region for over 25 years, "China has made a public and constitutional commitment to the preservation of religious freedom in Hong Kong.

"Jewish community leaders have maintained a low-keyed but effective communication with the Chinese government to ensure they know who and what we are... Jewish community members are positive contributors to Hong Kong's economic and cultural well being...[and] many are intimately involved with [mainland] China's economic self-transformation."

The question of how the change in political status of Hong Kong will affect individuals personally and professionally varies greatly, depending on one's nationality, employment and political affiliation. The policy of "localization" in the government, primarily aimed at replacing British civil servants with native Chinese, has resulted in a decline in the number of Jewish British citizens in the past two to three years.

Some feel there may be a further decrease in the number of British citizens in the Jewish community, as the British will now be treated like all other nationals requiring work permits and visas in order to work and live in Hong Kong.

There is further concern that the policy of "localization" might spill over into other areas of employment, such as in the universities. Jerome Hoberman, an American musical conductor employed at a local university, says he is concerned with possible loss of employment at the end of his current contract, but this, he adds, "has nothing to do with Judaism."

The increasing demand to speak Mandarin and Cantonese in the future will affect those teaching, as well as those doing business, in Hong Kong. In order to prepare the next generation, children in the Jewish day schools are now being taught Mandarin as part of their curriculum.

Leventhal anticipates no change for himself, as he is a sinologist (China specialist) fluent in both spoken and written Chinese, and is comfortable working and living within Chinese culture.

A British-born Appeal Court judge says he does not feel a threat to his job security either, as he is confident that China will maintain the present legal system for the next 50 years.

Others express concern over possible loss of academic freedom, freedom of speech, censorship of the press, human rights and the potential weakening of present laws. Most people, however, are not really concerned about the recent constitutional changes taking place, as they feel that "true" democracy has never existed in Hong Kong.

Given all the considerations, will people in the Jewish community stay or leave after June 30? Most Jews intend to stay in Hong Kong as long as jobs and opportunities exist.

Though many seem optimistic and hope for the best, there is an underlying sense of uncertainty. In any event, there is at present no mass exodus, according to Judy Diestel, a British dentist who has been living in Hong Kong for 30 years.

With their thriving Jewish population, the largest in Hong Kong's history, a newly rebuilt Jewish community centre and their positive history and association with the Chinese, the Jewish community is optimistic and building for the future. People feel the Jewish community in Hong Kong will continue to flourish as long as business is good and Hong Kong remains prosperous.

Clashes in Hebron

Israel handed over control of some 80 percent of Hebron to the Palestinians in January.

The Palestinian cabinet issued a terse statement last week, charging that Israeli settlement activity had provoked the unrest.

"The arming of Jewish setters and the protection offered to them by Israeli soldiers while they continuously attack Palestinian landowners will not leave our masses any choice but to confront these aggressions using all available means," said the statement.

Mordechai also visited the Jewish settlement of Morag in the Gaza Strip, where settlers and Palestinians had angry confrontations earlier this month over land ownership and boundaries. The defence minister pledged to try to resolve the problem.

U.S. policy confusing

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel's controversial decision to build a Jewish neighborhood in Har Choma has thrust the United States, its chief ally, into uncomfortable contortions.

Since February, when Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu unveiled plans to go ahead with construction there, Washington has been forced into the position of having to justify its seemingly inconsistent and confusing policy with respect to Jerusalem.

After Israel announced its intention to construct Har Choma, U.S. State Department spokesperson Nicholas Burns expressed "disappointment," claiming that the move would engender neither trust nor confidence.

Taking up this theme, President Bill Clinton told Palestine Authority chairman Yasser Arafat at a White House meeting that he would try to dissuade Israel from proceeding with Har Choma in advance of final status talks, which are supposed to resolve a litany of contentious issues, including that of Jerusalem.

Yet, at the United Nations, the United States — co-sponsor of the Oslo peace process — vetoed three Security Council resolutions and voted against one General Assembly resolution calling on Israel to halt the Har Choma housing project.

In the wake of the third veto, Bill Richardson, the American representative at the United Nations, defended U.S. policy.

The United States, he declared, is definitely opposed to Har Choma at this point in time. But United Nations interference in Middle East peace efforts inflames passions and hardens positions on both sides, he added.

Two weeks ago, the vexing issue surfaced once again. The U.S. House of Representatives passed a non-binding resolution recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital. It also voted to appropriate $100 million to transfer the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem.

Opposed by the Clinton administration, and decried by the Arabs as a "declaration of war" against the peace process and Palestinian interests, the resolutions resembled binding legislation, approved by both houses of Congress in October 1995, to transfer the U.S. embassy to Jerusalem by 1999, subject to the president's consent.

Bill Clinton, regarded as the most pro-Israel president in history, lobbied against the 1995 measure on the grounds that Jerusalem's status should be jointly determined by Israel and the Palestinians at final status talks (which have yet to begin).

But when he was campaigning for the presidency in 1992, Clinton voiced support for the principle that Jerusalem is Israel's "undivided, eternal" capital and that the U.S. embassy should be located there.

Ronald Reagan, one of his predecessors, expressed similar sentiments. Yet in 1984, when Congress introduced a bill sanctioning the move of the U.S. embassy to Jerusalem, the Reagan administration strongly opposed it.

George Shultz, the U.S. secretary of state, argued that it would provoke a wave of anti-American violence in the Islamic world. His warning had the desired effect. The proposed legislation withered on the vine.

Despite its strategic alliance with Israel, the United States neither recognizes Jerusalem as Israel's capital nor even its sovereignty over the western sector of the city. Indeed, in no other country but Israel is the American embassy situated outside the administrative capital.

Until the Six Day War, Washington supported the internationalization of Jerusalem. Since 1967, the United States has hewed to the view that Jerusalem should remain physically unified but that its permanent status should be determined solely by negotiations.

Washington believes that unilateral actions in Jerusalem are counter-productive. There are at least two examples to support this thesis. Thirteen of 15 embassies relocated to Tel Aviv in 1980 when the Knesset proclaimed Jerusalem as Israel's undivided capital. And as a direct result of Har Choma, the Palestinians have indefinitely frozen bilateral talks with Israel.

The Week in Israel

June 16

• Five Turkish navy vessels docked in Israel. The move was seen as the latest sign of Ankara's growing military ties with the Jewish state.

June 17

• Israeli water experts attended talks in the Omani capital of Muscat to discuss water problems in the region. Water experts from Egypt, Jordan, the Palestinian Authority, the United States, Europe and Japan also attended.

• Israeli planes attacked suspected Hezbollah targets in the Bekaa valley in Lebanon. It was the 39th raid by Israel this year against terror targets in Lebanon.

June 18

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu expressed "cautious optimism" that a compromise on the conversion issue would be reached within the next few weeks. Reform and Conservative leaders have agreed to postpone all legal proceedings on the matter.

• Yisrael b'Aliyah continued its coalition rebellion, supporting several bills in the Knesset against the government. Party leader Natan Sharansky said that his party already has "one foot out of the door of the government."

June 19

• The founder of Boys Town Jerusalem, Rabbi Alexander Linchner, died at the age of 89. Boys Town Jerusalem, which has Jewish learning and vocational training as its two pillars, has more than 1,000 students ranging from junior high school to the junior college level.

June 20

• Israeli media reported that Iran has decided, in coordination with Hezbollah, to attack Israeli, Turkish and U.S. targets in the Middle East and abroad. Diplomatic sources cited a meeting on June 2 in Beirut between Hezbollah and the emissaries of the recently elected president of Iran, Mohammed Khatami where these decisions were allegedly made.

• Israel's Conservative movement condemned a marriage between two women performed Wednesday by a Reform rabbi, saying that it had crossed the "red line" in terms of Halachah.

Reporter's Russian odyssey makes a fascinating read

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

TORONTO — In 1990, fresh out of graduate school, Torontonian Jennifer Gould had what most journalism school graduates only dream about – a good job at a respected newspaper.

Yet just over a year later, Gould, then 24, forsook all that. She decided to pack her bags and travel by herself to the uncertainty of Moscow with no guarantees of anything, just a few freelance contacts she had made before she left. She didn't even speak Russian.

"I had a wonderful job in Philadelphia," she said in an interview to promote Vodka, Tears and Lenin's Angel, a book documenting her four years in the former Soviet Union (FSU). "But at that time the Soviet Union was collapsing. It was a historic time and I wanted to write about that. It was one of the most important events of our century. I had to go there and see this."

Gould realized that by the time she paid her dues the normal way and finally got the job she coveted – a foreign correspondent – she would be old and grey. "I didn't want to wait. I wanted to go when I was still young. It's part of what would make it so special."

Moscow, and the rest of the FSU, was just reeling from the end of communism. Unbridled capitalism was rife. So was lawlessness, anti-Semitism, organized crime, poverty and homelessness. Hardly something most single young women (and for that matter, men) want to throw themselves into.

"A lot of people told me not to go, but I did it," she said. "The rewards are incredible. You have to be a certain type of person to do this."

One of the rewards was being one of the few Western journalists to get a free interview with nationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky, a "crazed, neo-fascist madman," she writes in her book, who "hurled flowerpots and spat at Jewish protesters in France...and threatened to nuke his neighbors." At the time, Zhirinovsky was asking up to $15,000 for an interview, but through persistence Gould managed to interview him for free in seven sessions, the results of which were published in Playboy.

The scene for the interviews was a boat ride down the Volga on a grass-roots campaign for the presidential election. Ever resourceful and persuasive, Gould got permission to climb aboard and stayed on the boat for eight days amongst bodyguards, xenophobes, stringy boys and potbellied men with armbands.

"Zhirinovsky already reminds me of Mr. Kurtz, Conrad's ivory trader corrupted by greed, environment, circumstances, long descended into madness," she writes. "My Volga has transformed into the Congo and I, too, am going downstream into a post-Cold War Heart of Darkness."

"It was creepy and weird," she told me recently. "But I never felt intimidated. Russia [bad as it was] was not a tin-pot dictatorship where foreign journalists just disappear. Nothing like that was going to happen. I never felt I was in any physical danger.

"I think Zhirinovsky's a chameleon," she said. "I don't think he's so anti-Semitic. To me, he is the best friend of Jews and Israel and at the same time he tells Russian peasants that the problems are the fault of the Jews and foreigners. He would change for his audience."

In the 1993 parliamentary elections, Russians by now disillusioned with the "Wild-West" lawlessness that was paralyzing their nation, Zhirinovsky's campaign of flowers for women, no more food lines and cheap vodka for men, won his Liberal Democratic Party 23 percent of the ballots cast. His popularity now seems to be dwindling and he was hardly a force in the 1996 elections.

Gould believes the irony is that Zhirinovsky was working for Yeltsin in 1993, not against him.

"He was partly set up by the KGB to give the illusion of a multi-party system," she said. By appearing so far on the right, "he allowed Yeltsin to move to the right and still look like a democrat even though he launched a civil war [Chechnya] that killed 100,000 people."

Now with Yelstin solidly backed by the United States, the threat of a dangerous fascist leader is no longer needed. "Zhirinovsky's use has ended," she said.

Vodka, Tears and Lenin's Angel is a fascinating read. Her chronicles are filled with a unique perspective, rarely found in newspaper accounts, as she tells of apartment-hunting and "getting Sov'd" (monthly rent increases even after you signed a contract); a joy ride with a hyper 19-year-old millionaire; the joys of Soviet-era hotels (orange bed covers and fried chicken); interviews with "swallows" (women trained by the KGB on the art of seducing western spies); following the trail of a murdered American diplomat; her trip to war-torn Chechnya; and unfortunate accounts of the dispossessed – children living on the streets and whole families living in railway stations.

In one chapter, she relates a personal incident when she was mugged by three thugs in a taxi cab. To this day, she's not sure if it was a purely financially-motivated crime or if the gangsters were trying to scare her off a story.

The event shook her to the point she was sure she would leave Russia and return home the next day. However after she calmed down and she was safe, she changed her mind.

"I felt that once it was over, no one's going to force me to leave," she said. "I'm not leaving until I'm ready to leave. I wasn't going to let them get the better of me. It's one of the dangers of living there – you have to take risks."

Despite all the crime, corruption and anarchy, Gould believes that the average Muscovite is nothing like that. "People I kept coming across were so wonderful. They gave when they have nothing to give, even to strangers. They really put up with a lot."

She says the trouble lies with all the ruling elite. "Human life seems to be of such little value for the people at the top. Money has created a new class of people who have no values. They do whatever it takes. Some people are so wonderful, some are corrupt beyond belief."

During her stay in the FSU, Gould spent some time visiting Jewish communities particularly in Odessa, Georgia and in Bukhara, where she was surprised to see a large picture of the Lubavitcher Rebbe in one of the homes. Despite the mass emigration of Jews and assimilation, Gould is optimistic about the future of Judaism in the FSU.

"My parents' generation in Ukraine are cultural Jews," she said. "[Though atheist], they married other Jews but their children are really interested in knowing their history. With the new synagogues and schools, there is a rebuilding of Jewish culture."

However, as far as the future of Russia itself, Gould is far from optimistic and compares present-day Russia with the Weimar Republic.

"There is a growing divide between the rich and poor. Western politicians realized too late there is no history of democracy in Russia. I believe things will get a lot worse before they get better."

Perhaps worse still, towards the end of her Russian journey in 1996, Gould witnessed a disturbing rebirth of communism.

"In 1991, they were tearing down statues she says. "In 1996, Yeltsin had red flags flying in the Red Square on May Day. In the 1996 elections, the Communists had 40 percent of the vote. When you consider that all post-Communist elections had elements of fraud, I have a feeling it was more than that."

Whereas in the early '90s the Communist rallies were filled with old people, Gould observed a lot more young people during the 1996 Communist rallies.

Gould is now back in North America, writing for The Village Voice in New York. She is looking forward to going to Moscow for the city's 850th anniversary celebration this fall and although she would like to work overseas again, she might choose a different country next time.

Vodka, Tears and Lenin's Angel (Alfred A. Knopf Canada) is currently on the bestseller list of the Toronto Star and other publications. The book is a candid snapshot of the everyday people that make present-day Russia what it is. Gould's conversational style and flowing prose makes this one of the most enjoyable first-person accounts I've read in a long time.

The magic of Al Jolson can still fill a theatre

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Brian Conley as Al Jolson.

TORONTO — Eighty years after he became a Broadway sensation, the name Al Jolson can still fill a theatre and the music he immortalized can still tug at the proverbial heartstrings of contemporary audiences.

Impresarios Ed and David Mirvish proved this beyond a doubt last week when the lavish musical Jolson opened at their Royal Alex Theatre in Toronto, giving highly appreciative theatregoers the illusion of seeing the real Al Jolson at his best in front of an adoring public.

Reprising the award-winning role he originated on the London stage, British actor Brian Conley looks and sounds like the genuine article. He's also able to kindle that magical spark between performer and audience that Jolson was famous for.

The show's two acts, set in the New York of the 1920s and 1940s, move quickly from one milestone to another in Jollie's celebrated career: his first breakthrough one-man show, his role in the first cinematic talking picture, his stint as an army performer, his work on the soundtrack for the movie The Jolson Story, his dazzling farewell performance at Radio City Music Hall.

The music may be orchestrally lush and romantic but writers Francis Essex and Rob Bettinson do not romanticize when it comes to Jollie's character. He is realistically depicted as a uniquely gifted performer with an ego the size of the Empire State Building, indeed all of Manhattan.

Not only does he trample indifferently upon the careers and feelings of aspiring performers and songwriters around him, he alienates even his wife Ruby Keeler (the wonderful Sally Ann Triplett) and his agent Louis Epstein (the equally wonderful John Bennett). As the latter generously remarks, Al Jolson was not the easiest man to get along with.

The character becomes sympathetic, even understandable, when we learn that his mother died when he was a boy, having whispered a dying wish to him that he make something of himself.

The grand finale features trademark tunes like Swanee, Baby Face, Sonny Boy and Give My Regards to Broadway, each one a showstopper. But the audience is so primed for My Mammy that when Jolson finally delivers it on one knee – "It's my Mammy I'm talkin' about, no one else's!" – people are dabbing tears from their eyes.

The Royal Alex production is no less fine than the production I saw last year in London, where the show originated. The only difference seems to be that the musical won the 1996 Olivier Award for Best Musical in the interval.

Jolson: The Musical is playing at the Royal Alex until Aug. 2. For tickets ($25 to $89) call TicketKing at 416-872-1212 or 800-461-3333. END.

Israel to maintain ban on Gulf imports

BY DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The ban on imports from the Gulf states will remain in force, Israel's Industry and Trade Ministry Foreign Trade Administration director said recently, in response to Federation of Chambers of Commerce president Dan Gillerman's plea that it be lifted.

Zohar Peri said restricted imports are already permissible from Qatar and Oman.

Israel's Trade Representation Office head in Qatar Sami Ravel said it is important where relations already exist that Israel do its utmost to strengthen them.

Trade volume with Arab and Muslim countries in general is far higher than data from the Central Bureau of Statistics (CBS) suggests, according to federation Islamic Countries Section director Mandy Barak.

The CBS cited the following totals for trade in the first quarter this year (in US dollars):

Exports to Egypt – $11 million (-16 percent on the same period last year), imports – $6.7million (+4 percent); Jordan – $3.5million (+400 percent), $2.7 million (+500 percent); Morocco – $1.4 million $320,000; Tunisia $280,000, $500 (thought to be in textiles); Mauritania $100,000, $0; United Arab Emirates $4,400, $0; and Oman $48,000, $0.

"Trade with Morocco, for example, is many thousands of percent larger than these official figures," said Barak.

However, Barak maintains trade with Israel's Arab neighbors will never be particularly sizable. He cited a variety of reasons including:
•The huge difference between the economies and markets is extremely difficult to bridge. The exception to this pattern is in the Gulf states, where there is a slightly higher per capita GDP and therefore Israeli exports become affordable, particularly in exchange for petroleum.
•The type of imports needed in Arab countries are largely not compatible with what Israel has to offer.

Admitting that trade is carried out with most Arab states – including Lebanon, Syria and Iraq, usually via a third country or offshore company – Barak urged Israelis not to enter these countries "with Israeli flags aloft," but rather take a gentle, quiet approach.

Canadian panelists disagree at arts conference

By SIMON HAUPT
Special to The CJN

BOSTON — Jewish writers must return to their religious and spiritual roots to produce uniquely Jewish art, said Ottawa poet Seymour Mayne.

Novelist Mordecai Richler insisted, on the other hand, that Jews should not ghettoize themselves by writing only about Jewish matters

Both were panelists at a recent conference on Canadian Jewish arts.

"Without knowing the Jewish tradition, going back to Tanach, Talmud, contemporary Holocaust thinkers and philosophers, Jews will not have a sense of what their vision of the world has been as they've evolved over 3,000 years," said Mayne. "There's a richness out there and if you turn away from it, you lose a lot of what it has to offer."

The poet, a professor of English at the University of Ottawa and the author or editor of more than 40 books of poetry, was part of a panel on Canadian Jewish Arts and Identity. Along with Mayne and Richler, the panel featured film professor John Katz, Winnipeg-born Israeli composer Aharon Harlay, film producer Elliot Halpern (Deadly Currents) and Quebec writer Regine Robin (The Québécoise).

Mordecai Richler

Richler disagreed with Mayne, arguing that a writer's only responsibility is to tell the truth.

"Writers are not to be confused with the Anti-Defamation League ...We write of the world as we see it," said Richler.

"If John Updike were sitting here, you wouldn't ask him about being a Protestant writer. You write out your own experience and your own obsessions."

The weekend began with a keynote speech by Richler, who regaled the audience with tales of his youth spent aspiring to a state of worldly sophistication while growing up in Montreal. He sketched a history of Montreal's Anglo-Jewish community, which flourished despite long-standing anti-Semitism in Quebec, but has since diminished in size and importance because of the separatist threat.

"My cherished Montreal is now a dying city," he concluded.

The weekend wasn't all politics, however. The day after his speech, Richler gave the first North American reading from his forthcoming novel, Barney's Version. With his mordant wit, Richler read a chapter that poked fun at his usual targets of self-important businessmen and left-wing do-gooders. The novel will be published in Canada this October.

Following Richler's reading, Mayne offered a history of Jewish Canadian poetry, telling the audience that Jews have been a part of Canadian culture from the very beginning. As proof, he spoke of the 1864 publication of Selections from Canadian Poets, which contained works by the English-born Isadore Asher.

"That one Jew, among the 30 to 40 Anglo-Celtic writers in the book, represented the only minority contributing at that time to the formation of Canadian literature," said Mayne.

Mayne also read from the work of many significant Jewish Canadian poets, including A.M. Klein, Leonard Cohen, Carol Rose, Shel Krakofsky, and Vancouver writer Miriam Waddington.

The conference concluded with screenings of the acclaimed documentary, Deadly Currents, and the 1974 comedy, The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz.

Sponsored by Northeastern University's Jewish Studies Program, the conference held May 31 to June 2 was the second in a series of annual Northeastern symposia designed to study Jewish life in the Diaspora. Last year's inaugural conference featured the art and culture of Latin American Jews. Future programs will study Jewish arts in South Africa, the former Soviet Union, Brazil and Australia.

"Nobody else is doing this kind of thing," said Prof. James Ross, one of the conference organizers. "There are a lot of Jewish studies programs, but not many are interested in the Diaspora beyond the United States. Americans don't have much awareness of Canadian life and Jewry.

"If you look at Toronto and the range of arts in that community, in terms of a Jewish community outside New York, you wouldn't find anything with that kind of depth or breadth. And Winnipeg has some of the best klezmer bands in the world."

Iraq explores trade possibility with Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A large Iraqi firm has reportedly approached Israel with the knowledge of the Baghdad authorities to explore trade possibilities with Israel.

Contacts were made through the Israel-Arab Friendship Association in order to pave the way for the imports of large quantities of Israeli food products, medicines and car parts in exchange for Iraqi fuel, Israel Radio reported last month.

Israeli officials were examining whether such a deal would be possible under the terms of the United Nations regulations that allow Baghdad to sell limited amounts of oil in exchange for necessary food and medical supplies, according to Israel Radio.

Israeli over the top in theatre of oppressed

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Erica Knoller, an 81-year-old Israeli who married the Dutch psychiatrist who hid her in his closet, is the sole performer in a play about her life, Erica's Paradise.

The play was part of the Ripple Theatre festival about oppression and obviously, Knoller believes she was oppressed by her three husbands, including the psychiatrist who has left her.

She now lives in Haifa, where she says her home is a haven for New Age enthusiasts.

The events that followed are not to be found in the pages of a family newspaper.

Knoller writes and acts well, but her performance is over the top and she got so carried away, that even after the final curtain she kept on talking, delaying start of the next play.

But it cannot be denied that she has made a significant contribution to theatre of the oppressed, though not everyone will agree with her actions and rationale.

Another production in the festival, a play by Jewish Theatre Projects, employed the audience participation techniques of Augusta Boal, founder of theatre of the oppressed.

One skit involved a Christmas office party where a Jewish staffer endured stereotypical remarks. Several members of the audience went on stage to take the Jewish actor's part. One turned the tables on his tormentors. Another showed how the incident could be used to educate the non-Jews who kept referring to Chanukah as the Jewish Christmas.

In this skit, the original actors, Mark Albert, Shifra Zisman and Kevin Zelig, under the direction of artistic director Jodi Miller, were highly effective.

Another skit dealt with misleading advice being given by her friends to a fiance who wants to put off marriage in favor of a career, while another concerned a busy doctor who has no time to spend with his son, but tries to fob him off with a $100 bill.

The last, and perhaps the most telling, concerned an overweight daughter consistently criticized by her mother in favor a prettier sister.

Books aid in exploring Europe's nooks and crannies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's that time of the year again: Canadians are flocking to Europe. If you're joining the crowd, try reading the following guidebooks.

Now into its third edition, Western Europe on a Shoestring (Raincoast Books, $34.95) is crammed with practical information. It's a book independent travellers on a tight budget should immerse themselves in.

From stylish Barcelona to funky Torremolinos, Spain, as generations of tourists have discovered, is a remarkably beguiling country. Spain (Raincoast Books, $28.50) explores the nooks and crannies of this popular destination with panache.

Neighboring Portugal, with its sunny beaches, seaside resorts, wineries and teeming markets, is also a magnet for travellers. Portugal (Raincoast Books, $25.50) fills in the details in concise and timely fashion.

France always beckons, whether you're an habitue of cafes, a stroller of elegant streets, an aficionado of museums or a buyer of haute couture. France (Raincoast Books, $28.50), which was originally published several years ago, has been updated for your convenience.

Paris, as anyone can attest, is one of the wonders of France. Paris (Raincoast Books, $18.50), a pocket-size guide to the City of Lights, sizes it up with aplomb.

If you like to walk, Britain is the place for you, since it's blessed with a web of immaculately maintained coastal, forest and mountain paths. Walking in Britain (Raincoast Books, $25.50) is an eminently useful guide on routes, long and short, from the Lake District to the Cotswolds.

On average, a newly-married couple spends $5,000 on a honeymoon. The Good Honeymoon Guide (Raincoast Books, $21.95) helps couples make the best of their trip in Europe (or anywhere else in the world). Author Lucy Hone profiles 500 romantic hotels and resorts for a range of budgets. As the ad goes, don't leave home without it.

A knowledge of languages is always useful when you're travelling in Europe. Western Europe Phrasebook (Raincoast Books, $9.95) and Scandinavian Europe Phrasebook (Raincoast Books, $9.95) fill in the gaps quite nicely.

Israeli airlines to ban smoking

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Transport Ministry has decided to ban smoking on Israeli airline flights of less than five hours.

The ban will affect most flights from Israel to Europe.

Similar sanctions are already in effect of flights of less than two hours.

The three Israeli airlines – El Al, Arkia and Sun D'or – have 90 days to respond to the proposal, before it goes into effect for a year-long trial period.

Ultra-upscale couples hotel offers elegance, fun

BY BRAM EISENTHAL
Special to the CJN

NASSAU — Vacationers love to be pampered and are often willing to pay a little extra for that special place where everything is taken care of and the only energy expended is deciding what to wear or what to eat.

Starting with one hotel in Montego Bay, Sandals now has 10 hotels in the Caribbean including Jamaica, St. Lucia, Antigua and the Bahamas. The expanding empire also includes two new resorts for singles, couples and families called Beaches.

The flagship of the chain, Sandals Royal Bahamian in Nassau, is the latest addition to the empire. The 196-room (soon to be expanded to 400-room) hotel was a private beach club and more recently the Balmoral Beach Hotel, before it was converted to Sandals last summer. Sandals Royal Bahamian general manager Stephen Ziadie stressed the unique nature of his resort.

"Our product is ultra-upscale in an elegant and fun setting. We don't offer a mass-market club atmosphere and we want to maintain a quality clientele, so, yes, we are more expensive. But the Bahamas are an expensive, exotic destination that more and more travellers are returning to every year."

Here, all-inclusive means all meals, snacks, wine and liquor, transfers to and from the airport, as well as rides to nearby attractions such as the neighboring casino, green fees at nearby Cable Beach Golf Club, SCUBA and snorkeling gear rental and nightly entertainment including musical bands, singers and comedians.

A state-of-the-art workout facility overlooks the Caribbean and a modest assortment of mills, bikes, muscle machines and free weights help keep you in top shape.

A freshwater pool allows for participation in water polo, or merely floating on a raft all day. There are also a waterfall, several outdoor jacuzzis, a misting pool and a swim-up bar with stools.

As well, Sandals' has its own private island, five minutes away by boat. There is little to do on Balmoral Island but experience an idyllic existence.

Here you will find a pool with another swim-up bar, a cafe and another expanse of beach, all reserved for guests.

Water sports and activities have become popular with tourists in recent years. Even first-timers can take part in many activities.

For a special sort of pleasure and the ultimate in personal pampering, however, the spa is the way to go. Prices here are not included in Sandals' all-inclusive deal.

Hydrotherapy, their signature treatment, is quite rare at many other spas, due to the price of the state-of-the-art Hydrotherm unit. Swedish massage is also popular; an average of 20 to 30 are administered daily by the eight masseurs and masseuses on staff. All are certified, but only one can be considered a legend: Charles Hubert Bowleg.

Bowleg is 71 and you know he has the key to the fountain of youth. He received his training in the United States 47 years ago and he has been a leading masseur in the Bahamas ever since.

The best time for a massage, he says, is at night before bed, as sleep comes easily after his manipulations.

"Massage aids circulation, relaxes the body and gets the kinks out of tight muscles," Bowleg says. "It is great for stress. I recommend two per week minimum instead of medication." Bowleg has massaged many celebrities over the years, including Sidney Poitier, Merv Griffin, Ronald Reagan Brian Mulroney.

For those contemplating tying the knot, Sandals' Weddingmoon program takes care of every detail of your event. The only legal requirement, is that you spend at least 24 hours in the Bahamas prior to "the big day."

Whether newlywed or wedded veteran, however, this is the ultimate spot to rediscover what being a couple is all about.

Poolside relaxation at Sandals.

Kayaking and other such activities are included in the price.

Jerusalem firm launches Internet multimedia experience over Internet

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A local company launched a "Virtual Community of Tomorrow," offering CD-ROM quality multimedia experiences over the Internet in the user-friendly format of a "theme park" with pavilions.

Community Network Systems, part of the Net Results holding company in the capital's Talpiot industrial zone, offers the multimedia Funk & Wagnalls Encyclopedia – which includes a games arcade, cooking classes, chat groups, medical advice from Johns Hopkins University, movies, concert halls, shopping, the Reuter news center, museum visits and more on VCOT.

The services are now all in English and aimed at Internet users worldwide, but the intention is to start a Hebrew-language service suited to Israelis within a year, using the services of Virtual Jerusalem, of which Net Results owns a part.

The service (via www.VCOT.com) is free during its initial launch and then, starting this fall, will cost $29.95 a year for its basic package (cooking classes, for example, will cost an additional fee).

El Al to be sold on stock exchange?

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

A committee set up to examine privatizing Israel's national carrier, El Al, has recommended that 100 percent of the airline's capital be sold on the Tel Aviv stock exchange in 1998.

The committee recommended that all the stocks be sold at once in stocks and warrants. It rejected the prospect of trying to sell the airline to a strategic investor, out of concern the airline's heavy losses would prevent it from fetching a good price.

One of the obstacles to privatization, a ban on flying of Shabbat, was dealt with in the committee's report, which said the airline should be allowed to fly on Shabbat, as long as it does not increase the overall air traffic on this day.

Living wills help families face medical dilemmas

Trying to relieve loved ones' burden of making painful decisions

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The goal of making what is known as a living will is "to help people face death in the context of their families," asserts Dr. Peter Singer, director of the University of Toronto Joint Centre for Bioethics.

Singer was speaking at a recent symposium on Controversies in Medical Ethics: Jewish and Secular Perspectives, sponsored by the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, through the Fay Florence Grobin Memorial Fund.

Singer quoted the findings of a doctoral research project, which aimed to discover why attempts to get people to prepare living wills had failed, no matter how hard social workers, nurses and doctors had tried to encourage it.

The study showed that the attempts failed "because the focus was on the health-care provider, rather than recognizing that these kinds of decisions really take place in the living room, in informal discussions between family members."

As well, he said, professionals had assumed that people wanted to prepare these documents to ensure that their wishes were carried out, to prepare for their incapacity, and to set out the doctor/patient relationship.

In fact, he said, the study showed that while patients did indeed want to maintain some control, one of their main concerns was to relieve the burden on their loved ones of making painful decisions and maintaining a prolonged death watch.

"They viewed the process of making a living will as a way of preparing for death, and the final document often didn't involve doctors, nurses or lawyers at all.

He suggested that health care and legal staff "should get out of the way, and support the families in their discussions and planning, rather than issuing directives."

Issues dealt with in living wills, or advance directives as they are often called, may include such matters as tube feeding, use of a respirator, cardio-pulmonary rescuscitation, surgery, transfusion, use of antibiotics, dialysis, and even providing food and liquid when a person becomes incapable of making such decisions himself.

The living will should also appoint someone to make those decisions for the patient if he becomes incompetent. That person may be an attorney, a spouse or partner, a child, a parent, a brother or sister, any other relative, or the provincial guardian. Provincial law directs that a hierarchy be observed — a spouse has the strongest right to make those decisions over a child, but a child has rights before a brother or sister.

It is assumed, Singer said, that these decisions will be made, not only in the best interests of the patient, but in accord with values he held when he was well.

Dr. Michael Gordon, vice president, medical services, at Baycrest, and a professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, and the program chair, added that a distinction often must be drawn between what a patient wants and what the family wants.

"You have to understand their wants in the context of their life," he said. "For instance, a Holocaust survivor, might value survival at any cost.

As well, he said, it is not unusual to go through the whole process of creating an advanced directive, and then be told by the patient "ask my daughter, even if her opinion is different from mine."

Singer also announced that as of July 1, Baycrest will be fully connected to the Joint Bioethics Centre.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I am trying to get more fibre in my diet, but am getting tired of bran cereals. Where else can I find fibre?
A. There are a lot of other fabulous sources of fibre. Try baked beans, figs, prunes, almonds, peanuts, corn, popped corn, peas, spinach, dried apricots, raisins, raspberries, whole wheat bread and legumes or lentils. These should help to add some variety to your diet along with a healthy helping of fibre.
Q. Can you settle an argument please. Are certain lettuces more full of vitamins than others?
A. Yes! Use the lettuces that are darker green to get more vitamins per mouthful. Romaine lettuce has four times as much Vitamin C and beta carotene as iceberg lettuce, as well as twice the folic acid. Also try dark greens like, spinach, arugula and watercress.
Q. My baby is only 2½ months old but has a very hearty appetite. Is it too soon to introduce infant cereals?
A. Infant cereals should not be started until about four months of age. At that time, babies are physically more able to handle the cereal in terms of their swallowing capabilities, ability to manoeuvre the cereal in their mouth and ability to sit and hold their heads. Also until that time, babies' digestive systems are really not mature enough to handle cereal and will not be able to digest it properly; they will therefore not benefit nutritionally. Wait until four months or until your child's doctor advises you to start.
Q. I have a 6-week-old baby. At what age do I need to switch to an infant formula with iron?
A. By four months, you should switch your baby to an infant formula with iron.

The Maccabiah in Israel — let the games begin

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After years of preparation, organization and selection, it's time to get down to competition.

On July 9, 250 of Canada's best Jewish athletes will board an El Al charter and wing their way to the Holy Land to participate in the 15th Maccabiah Games.

The '97 squad is Canada's largest to date and perhaps most talented. With the inclusion of hockey for the first time in the Games' history, some of Canada's best Jewish athletes, including professionals, have been given the opportunity to compete.

In addition to the puck-chasers, Canada will be represented by top teams in men's softball, winners of the gold medal last time out, in basketball, squash, weightlifting, bowling, karate, tennis, swimming, judo and taekwon-do. Altogether, Canadians will compete in 35 of the 43 recognized sports that will be featured at the games, with many taking part in unofficial events like falafel-eating and the beachside vodka clinics.

Although the Canadian team is the largest yet, they're a modest proportion of the total athlete participation. Altogether, 6,000 sportsmen and women from more than 50 countries are expected to attend the games, making them one of the largest international sporting events in the world. An estimated 50,000 to 60,000 spectators will cheer the athletes when they march into Ramat Gan Stadium for the opening ceremonies on July 14, which kick off the 10-day Games.

From there, the Canadian athletes will disperse to half a dozen cities where they will be lodged during the competition.

The hockey and rugby teams, both with 23 athletes, are the largest single groups of athletes in the Canadian contingent, while lone athletes will represent Canada in badminton (Laura Lande, a Quebecer) and in table tennis (Andrew Giblon of Toronto). The beach volleyball team is not much larger, consisting of Dan Padva of Alberta and Jack Serlin of British Columbia.

Canada will send a 12-athlete bowling team to the games, headed by Lisa Abush, who'll be participating in her third Maccabiah. Abush recently bowled a 300 game in a competition in Peterborough, points out Bob Guest, a Toronto-based member of Maccabi Canada's national athletic committee.

The wrestling team includes two nationally-ranked grapplers — Andrew Borodow and Oleg Ladik of Montreal — who represented Canada at the Olympic Games in Atlanta last year.

The softball team, which beat the Americans for gold at the '93 games after two consecutive silver medal finishes, will have the three Green brothers on board, Bob, Mark and Rick. Bob played on the world fastball champion Gators.

The tennis team consists of six men and four women along with four junior boys and two junior girls, while the swimming team includes nine men, four women, three junior boys and two junior girls. The team should be of very high calibre, Guest said, since to make the cut, swimmers had to equal or better the bronze medal times from the '93 games.

Also on the team are top-ranked karate fighter Susan Adaskin of Toronto and national junior squash champion Greg Hutner of Toronto.

Three disabled athletes made the team, Nissim Louis of Montreal, Daniel Heuman from Ontario and Steven Pollack from British Columbia.

Making its first appearance at the games will be women's basketball.

The Maccabi Canada contingent includes 36 coaches, 13 medical personnel and 12 members of the Maccabi Canada administration. The 430-seat El Al charter is completely sold out, as friends and relatives bought up the remaining seats, Guest said.

Unlike the situation in the 1980s when the team was fully subsidized, athletes are being asked to pony up $1,500 of the $5,000 per athlete cost of sending them to Israel. Athletes and teams embarked on fundraising ventures, with some more successful than others. The hockey team exceeded its goal of $200,000 while the woman's basketball team was still short of its funding as of last week, though Guest believed they would meet their goal. Men's rugby likewise was scrambling to raise enough money, he added.

None of the masters athletes (35 and older) will be subsidized, Guest added.

While the inclusion of a woman's basketball team has raised the number of women on the Canadian team, Guest acknowledged that increasing female participation fell short of organizers' goals.

"From the beginning of our four-year term, we had a mandate to increase the number of women, but there just don't appear to be as many competing at that high a level," he said.

A recent posting on Maccabi Canada's Internet site listed 175 male athletes and 17 boys compared to 38 women and nine girls.

For many sportsmen and women, the Maccabiah affords their only opportunity to visit Israel. "We present it as an opportunity to represent your country at an international competition that includes Jews from all over the world," he said. "It combines sport with cultural and religious programming. Kids who have been there before froth at the mouth for the opportunity to go again."

USDS girls win hoops title

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The mantlepiece at USDS Bayview just got a little more crowded with championship trophies as a result of the triumph of the girls' basketball team in the Jewish Day School Basketball League.

The USDS Warriors defeated Bialik 26-17 in the championship game, giving the school a clean sweep in three inter-school competitions over the past season.

In mid-winter, the boys hockey team captured the Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament for the second consecutive year, while the boys basketball team went undefeated to capture the day school boys basketball championship. Now it was the turn of the girls, who capped off a 14-1 season with the title win.

USDS competes in a day school league that includes teams from Bialik, Leo Baeck, Netivot Hatorah, USDS Bathurst and teams from Associated's Leslie and Finch branches.

USDS Bayview squeaked by Associated's Finch team in the semi-final before meeting Bialik in the championship game.

"The girls are beginning to play fabulous basketball and the games are getting close," said Barbara Tweyman, vice-principal at USDS Bayview.

While the 6-year-old league promotes good athletic competition, its main raison d'être is its role in enhancing school spirit and camaraderie. It also helps create friendship among students at various day schools, Tweyman said.

"Sport is alive and well and flourishing at the day schools," she said.

מאת: יעל זליגר

נביא מאת: שולמית הראבן

About families

Dear Susan,

I am currently planning our firstborn's wedding. My husband and I had a tumultuous divorce 20 years ago. Money was a major source of friction.

My son's bar mitzvah was hell on wheels because of our inability to resolve old hurts. As my daughter's wedding approaches I find myself anxious about another recurrence of the heartache we suffered during my son's bar mitzvah.

Dear Reader,

Thank you for sharing your grief in such a candid fashion. It is clear that you and your ex have some homework to do in order to overcome your indifference and ensure a pleasant simchah.

You might consider mediation in order to resolve the issues that were not worked through when you initially became separated and divorced. You should reflect on your son's bar mitzvah and what went wrong. As parents you should make amends to your son for spoiling his day due to your inability to quash marital squabbles.

As a family discuss how you could have rewritten the script in order to ensure a pleasant bar mitzvah.

On the cusp of your daughter's simchah you have the opportunity to rewrite a wrong and recast the die. As one historian said you are only stupid if you make the same mistake twice. Make sure you redeem yourselves as parents who are less self-absorbed and more concerned about the situation at hand – your daughter and son-in-law's day. Be well and behave.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

War crimes cases heard

Supreme Court to decide whether to throw out cases

BY PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Lawyers for three alleged Nazi war criminals facing loss of citizenship were given a rough ride by the Supreme Court of Canada last week, as justices questioned their contention that the cases should be stayed.

Several judges agreed that a meeting between a senior Justice Department official and the Chief Justice of the Federal Court was wrong, but they wondered whether bringing the cases to a halt was the only available remedy.

Lawyer Donald Bayne, representing alleged war criminal Johann Dueck, said the integrity of the court was in question. The conduct was so egregious and the repercussions so vast that a stay of proceeding would be the only appropriate recourse.

Community divided over Pol Pot trial in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Leading Jewish spokespersons on the war crimes issue are divided over whether Canada should prosecute former Cambodian dictator Pol Pot for crimes against humanity.

While they agree that Pol Pot ought to be brought to justice, two believed the international community should bring him to trial, while two others thought Canada would be a better venue for a criminal prosecution of the Cambodian strongman.

"I think it ought to be the position of the Jewish community that everything that could be done to bring this man to justice should be done," said York University professor Irving Abella.

"I don't think we should be looking for excuses not to bring him to Canada," he said.

Winnipeg lawyer David Matas said, "I'm in favor of Canada accepting the call" to prosecute Pol Pot, but first Canada's war crimes legislation must be amended to remove defences that stymied a successful prosecution of alleged Hungarian war criminal Imre Finta.

The question of prosecuting Pol Pot arose last week, when U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright asked Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy at the Denver Summit of Eight to consider extraditing the former Cambodian leader.

Axworthy later told a conference of human rights expert in Toronto that Canada "ought to consider applying the laws to Pol Pot," The CJN's Ron Csillag reports.

Pol Pot led the mid-1970s communist government that killed an estimated two million Cambodians. Recent reports from Cambodia

Soldier's Memorial

JERUSALEM — Israel is considering moving a soldier's memorial after acknowledging that it was erected on Palestinian land in the Gaza Strip.

The soldier, Yehuda Levy, was killed by Palestinian sniper fire during riots in September that were sparked by the opening of a second entrance to an archeological tunnel in Jerusalem.

The erection of the memorial at the Gush Katif intersection in Gaza sparked tensions between Jewish settlers and Palestinians earlier this month. Palestinians said the memorial should be removed because it was on Palestinian land.

Citizenship Revoked

WASHINGTON — A U.S. District Court in Hammond, Ind., has revoked the citizenship of Kazys Ciurinskas, an Indiana man who served in a Nazi-sponsored mobile killing unit that murdered thousands of Jews and other in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus).

Human rights enforcement called difficult

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Getting the world's nations to sign treaties on human rights is relatively easy. Getting them to live up to those treaties is another matter.

In fact, the system that enforces the honoring of global human rights agreements has "broken down," Prof. Anne Bayefsky of York University told the conclusion of a three-day conference here last week.

Nearly 60 academics and human rights experts from around the world gathered to brainstorm on how to improve enforcement of signed treaties on basic civil, political and social rights, and how to deal with the rogue nations that often ignore them.

Israel was well represented at the conference, with three delegates: Judith Karp, the country's deputy attorney general and a member of the United Nations' Committee on the Rights of the Child; Prof. David Kretzmer, a member of the UN's Human Rights Committee and director of the Centre for Human Rights at Hebrew University's law faculty; and women's rights activist Carmel Shalev of the Association for Civil Rights in Israel.

Also on hand for the closing session was Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy, who said Canada "ought to consider" applying its laws on war crimes, enacted mainly to pursue alleged Nazis, against former Cambodian dictator Pol Pot, rumored captured by his former Khmer Rouge allies. (See related story, page 1.)

The United States has asked Canada to consider extraditing the former despot blamed for the deaths of some two million Cambodians during his reign of terror in the 1970s.

Canada, Axworthy said, is one of only a few countries to provide for war crimes trials for offenses committed outside its borders.

The conference focused on getting six key treaties enforced uniformly around the world. They deal with race, the rights of children, eliminating discrimination against women, wiping out torture, civil and political rights, and economic, social and cultural rights. Each area is represented at the UN as a distinct body. Committees hear reports every four or five years from individual countries on how they are faring in each category.

Canada and Israel are signatories to all six. Every country in the world has ratified at least one of the treaties.

Bayefsky, director of York University's Centre for Refugee Studies and a human rights expert, cited some troubling numbers about the state of human rights in the world: Ninety-five countries have five or more overdue reports and one-third of ratifying nations have never submitted a single report; the treaty calling for the banning of torture is the least ratified of the six, with half the UN membership not signed on; and the UN has not received complaints from individual citizens of 40 percent of the world's nations.

On the plus side, three-quarters of UN member states have ratified at least five of the treaties.

Predictably, nations with the poorest reporting have the worst human rights records. They include Lebanon, Somalia, Libya and Afghanistan.

Bayefsky did not let the UN off the hook. She decried the backlog of cases and the short shrift reports are often given. She said the whole system of implementation and reporting is in danger of losing its credibility.

She issued a well-received list of 131 suggestions on how to revitalize implementation and reporting, including the establishment of an international court of human rights and the need for follow-up with countries with poor records.

In past conferences on human rights, Israel has been invariably targeted through calls for exceptional reports, which means asking a country to issue a report on a specific area or issue at any given time.

Bayefsky's suggestions include refraining from requesting exceptional reports.

Her ideas will be forwarded to the UN and to Canada's Foreign Affairs and Justice departments.

Shalev said women have made enormous strides in Israel but still have a long way to go.

The biggest obstacle for women continues to be in the areas of marriage and family relations, she said. That's because marriage and divorce are governed solely by religious law. There is no civil divorce in Israel.

The country has no comprehensive bill of rights mainly because of the clash between religious and secular laws, she said.

Besides marriage, Israeli women, Shalev said, are focusing efforts on several key areas: under-representation in the political arena, unequal share of economic power, domestic violence and inequality in the military.

Kretzmer sits on the UN committee that will consider a complaint from a Toronto parent that Ontario's system of funding Catholic schools, but not Jewish ones, is discriminatory. The complaint was filed at the UN by Arieh Waldman last year, before Canada's Supreme Court ruled that Ontario is not obliged to fund all religious-based schools.

Kretzmer said he could not discuss the case, but said it could take several years before it is heard. Although UN decisions on human rights violations are not legally binding, they often influence countries to change their laws, he noted.

Karp, an expert on children's rights, said the treaty dealing with children has been ratified by all but two countries: Somalia and the United States.

The agreement calls for the outlawing of exploitation of children. Karp said the "real problem" is getting countries to honor it.

Volunteerism a hallmark of democracy

Last week in this space, I wrote about the significance that Judaism attaches to becoming actively involved in promoting the welfare and the betterment of one's community.

A logical extension of the importance of that obligation, I wrote, was the pursuit of elected office. But it was deeply regrettable and even harmful to our society in the long run, I added, that we seem to be going through a period of time where the public little respects the people who seek public office: our politicians.

But our politicians comprise only a small number of the total of the people who actually "get involved."

By far, the greatest number of those people in our society who "promote the welfare and the betterment of one's community" do so as volunteers, the lay leaders of the community, or as the professionals who work with them.

Our way of life rests upon the notion, built deeply into the structure of democracy like the stone at the centre of an arch, that duties attach to rights and responsibilities attach to freedoms.

This notion is the breath that breathes life into volunteerism. Thus, volunteerism – the epitome of getting involved – is both a hallmark and a requirement of democracy.

As most CJN readers know, Jewish life abounds with high levels of volunteerism. Organizational Jewish life – at every level, and of every type – would collapse without the involvement of volunteers, the lay leaders.

Similarly, the involvement of the volunteer lay leader can only be sustained with the support of the professional. Both are leaders "actively involved in promoting the welfare and the betterment of the community."

It is against this background that I refer to an article recently written by Gary Rosenblatt, the publisher and editor of the New York Jewish Week in which he reflected on the question: "What makes a Jewish leader?"

Some readers may recall that I have on other occasions referred to articles by Rosenblatt, a highly respected, thoughtful writer and journalist.

In the column, Rosenblatt wrote of his observations at a meeting of some 20 lay and professional leaders, the beneficiaries of a special training program of the Mandel Associated Foundations of Cleveland, who had convened for a single day to discuss, as he described, the "joys and woes of leadership."

"What emerged was a shared sense of anger and frustration at the current level of dissension and infighting among Jews along religious lines, and a common search for an over-arching vision that could unite the community."

Although Rosenblatt writes of the condition of the American Jewish community, his observations apply as well to the Canadian situation.

He goes on to observe that with the tasks of the sheer physical rescue and survival of Jews and of Israel "largely complete, a sense of sacred mission has been lost and the community has turned inward, focusing on communal survival in the face of growing assimilations and intermarriage. But religion has become less a common denominator than a bone of contention, with some activists calling for a return to tradition while others insist on expanding our definition of who is a Jew and what is Judaism."

After quoting some of the opinions of the participants at the meeting on their ideas of the criteria for leadership, Rosenblatt offers his own test.

"It's true that organizational leaders need to know how to cut budgets and raise dollars. But a Jewish leader needs to raise spirits as well. He or she must have a vision that incorporates a proud heritage with a hopeful future because Jewish leadership is about wisdom and guidance. It's about bringing people closer together, focused on shared sense of "chosenness" and becoming "a light unto the nations."

"Some of us believe our oldest model is still the best – the study of and commitment to Torah, however we define it. Campaign is important but covenant is imperative." (My emphasis)

It is clear, then, that Rosenblatt believes that one of the key tasks of the modern Jewish leader is to help bring about Jewish unity, to help restore among the modern-day people what was never lost among our forbears: a sense of Jewish interdependence and inter-relatedness.

He refers to this sense as a feeling of covenant. Not surprisingly, this was the very point that Rabbi Howard Joseph made so eloquently and so forcefully in his recent translation and study of the essay by Rabbi Naphtali Zvi Yehuda Berlin called The Remnant of Israel. (See From The Editor's Desk, The CJN, May 8)

* * *

Across my desk I received last week part of the June edition of the Montreal Anglican, the newspaper of the Anglican Diocese of Montreal.

It contained an article entitled "Faith and Ethnocultural Mission." A propos the subject of Jewish leadership, the article described a recent successful, interfaith event, an initiative of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

I shall excerpt a portion of that article.

"Canons David Oliver and Jeno Kohner recently took part in a Faith and Ethnocultural Leadership Mission to Washington, D.C. Canadian Jewish Congress, sponsors of the event, wished to share with Christian faith communities, and cultural groups, topics that they are working on, and invited us to attend as partners:

There were five topics:

- The unity of Canada.
- Dealing with hate.
- The deportation of war criminals who entered Canada on false pretexts.
- [Forcing] Swiss and other banking authorities who have not restored deposits of war victims to their inheritors, to do so.
- [T]he need to continually remember the Holocaust.

Our visit was an incredibly rich one...it was a privilege for us to have been invited."

Applying the Rosenblatt test of Jewish leadership – a vision that incorporates a proud heritage with a hopeful future...bringing people closer together...and becoming "a light unto the nations – the invitation by the CJC to the Anglican church seems to have been a positive example. MBD

An inter-generational dance

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Backstage at the Leah Posluns Theatre, dozens of girls dressed in leotards and costumes scurried through a maze of corridors and dressing rooms.

The young dancers, all students of the Koffler Centre School of Dance, were getting ready for their performance on the second night of Showcase '97, the school's year-end dance recital.

Warming up for the big night, teenage girls pirouetted in doorways, while tap dancers in turquoise shuffled down the halls. In a large mirrored dance studio near the dressing rooms, a group of jazz dancers had time for one last rehearsal.

The recent show offered an opportunity to showcase the talent of the school's 620 students. The second and third nights of the show also included performances by the Chai Dancers, a seniors dance troupe based at the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

More than 500 family members and friends were on hand for the second night's performance.

This night was particularly special for Vi Wolf and Chelsea Rubin's family. Wolf, a 17-year member of the Chai Dancers, performed in the same show as Chelsea, her 5-year-old great-grand daughter. The two were honored with a special presentation.

Wolf, a grandmother of three and great-grandmother of two, told The CJN that participating in the same show as her great-grand daughter was "a dream come true. I never thought it would happen."

Wolf who gave her age as "39 and still holding," danced professionally from the age of 12 until she married. Dancing keeps her young, she said.

"I feel like 18...I'll always dance. It's something I'll never give up. I'm going to dance my way to heaven."

In a telephone interview at the conclusion of Showcase '97 Jacque Foesier, director of the Koffler Centre School, said that the school has "reached a new milestone" with a great-grandmother and granddaughter dancing in the same program.

Canadian Jews were silent after Holocaust: researcher

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto scholar has ventured into little-explored areas in the well-tilled field of Holocaust research, and unearthed some fascinating, if disturbing, finds.

Frank Bialystock, in his PhD thesis in history at York University, has found that between 1945 and 1960, Canadian Jews exhibited a "collective amnesia" when it came to the murder of six million of their European brethren, while Holocaust survivors who immigrated here were too busy rebuilding their lives to dwell on the tragedy. The chasm between the two groups would not be bridged for years.

Bialystock, a son of survivors, has delved into what he calls "virgin territory." After poring over hundreds of archival documents and interviewing 35 survivors and others, he found two solitudes when it came to the Holocaust: Canadian Jews who ignored it for a variety of reasons, and survivors who buried it for their own reasons.

In short, he found that the Holocaust played a marginal role in the formation of Canadian Jewish consciousness in the 15 years after the war, a situation that reversed itself dramatically later.

The 400-page study, titled Delayed Impact: The Holocaust and the Canadian Jewish Community, 1945-1985, examines "collective memory," Bialystock, 51, told The CJN. "The essential question is, why was the Holocaust not talked about, not dealt with in Canada, for almost a generation? For a long time, there was silence."

The answer, he discovered, was that for Jews born in Canada, the Holocaust was, in the immediate post-war period, a foreign event that happened on distant shores. "It was tragic, a great loss. Some [Canadian Jews] lost family members. But it was not an event that was part of them. It was outside their experience," Bialystock explained. "The Holocaust played virtually no role in their self-definition."

As well, organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress had not yet politicized the issue of Nazi war criminals living here.

Survivors, meantime, were preoccupied with settling into a strange new land and dealing with their trauma. "When they did attempt to speak [about the Holocaust], reaction from Canadian Jews ranged from incomprehension to derision."

Faced with disinterest, disbelief and the myth that European Jews went to their deaths like sheep, survivors tended to stick together, in silence. They didn't want to tell, and Canadian Jews didn't want to know. It's what the author terms "historical amnesia."

"The whole period is marked by misperceptions. Survivors thought they were coming to a welcoming place, and found it difficult. Canadians thought survivors would be like all the other immigrants."

Bialystock looks for historical events that transformed the silence into action, and found that 1960 was the watershed year. Things began to change in late 1959, when a three-week spree of swastika daubings and desecrations of Jewish buildings took place in Toronto. Also in 1960, Adolf Eichmann was captured by Israeli commandoes. And on the national scene, U.S. Nazi leader George Lincoln Rockwell announced in a CBC interview that a Canadian neo-Nazi cell was active. Survivors, by this time more secure in their place in Canadian society, started to stir.

"They were no longer immigrants," the author says. "They weren't willing to sit by. [For them], Congress was not doing enough." Survivors thus became "radicalized."

The attitude among Canadian Jewish officials changed too. "There was an element of guilt [because] the community didn't lobby harder 30 years earlier [to bring Jewish refugees over.]"

The following 25 years were marked by what Bialystock calls the "institutionalization" of the Holocaust in the community's agenda. In 1973, Congress "very grudgingly" inaugurated its Holocaust Remembrance Committee, of which Bialystock is currently a member.

Bialystock's seminal study ends in 1985, when the whole issue "took off." It was that year the Deschenes commission began its inquiry into Nazi war criminals living in Canada, the first trials of Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra took place, and when thousands of survivors gathered for a conference in Ottawa. Despite setbacks, inaction and disappointments ever since, Canada's Jewish community would never be the same.

Baycrest bike-a-thon a real family affair

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The fourth annual Bike for Baycrest drew three generations of bikers.

Held recently in and around the grounds of the scenic King City Campus of Seneca College, the bike-a-thon was very much a family event, offering an afternoon of festivities that included a barbecue, pony rides, carnival games, a jumping dragon castle, paddle boat rides and arts and crafts.

The three different biking routes were designed to challenge riders of all levels. Participants had the choice of riding 14-, 30- or 60-kilometre routes. There was even a 3-km ride for kids. Riders were escorted by Toronto's only Jewish motorcycle group, the YOWIES (Yidden on Wheels).

Often called Mr. Baycrest, Sam Ruth, the president emeritus of the Baycrest Centre Foundation was out at the bike-a-thon with two generations of his family.

"The work of Baycrest is carried on from generation to generation; therefore, I was most pleased that one of my sons and one of my grandsons participated in the bike-a-thon," Ruth says. "This will ensure their longtime support for years to come. It was nice to see other three-generation families participating as well."

The bike-a thon, a fundraiser for the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, was organized by the leadership development group, which is made up of professionals and community-minded people between the ages of 25 and 45. Ron Melvin and Peter Seligman were the co-chairs. The group also runs a golf tournament, a hockey pool and an art auction.

Joanne Nisker, project coordinator for the leadership development group, says she was pleased with the turnout.

"The success of this annual fundraising event is the direct result of the hard work and dedication by a committed group of volunteers. Their effort and the generous support of our sponsors made this a fabulous day."

Mintz and Partners Chartered Accountants, the Royal Bank Financial Group, Sandylion Sticker Designs and the Sports Clubs of Canada were the main sponsors of the event, but many other businesses donated money, prizes, refreshments, beverages, loot bags and entertainment.

Kroft new Hadassah president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Sharon Kroft

TORONTO — What started off as a way to make new friends, has turned into a full-time volunteer career for Sharon Kroft, newly installed president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO.

Kroft, 47, originally from Windsor, says that as a new wife and mother, she turned to the organization 20 years ago, "strictly for friendship, but quickly realized [the organization] fills a far greater need. Coming from a city with a Jewish population of 100 families, I can appreciate being Jewish in Toronto. We often don't realize in a city this size what we have here."

After holding such positions as bazaar chair, Youth Aliyah chair and vice-president, she sees her two-year term as president as a chance to bring in new members and hold on to current members.To this end, she is reaching out to women who may not know about the organization.

"I advertised a group for 22- to 26-year-old women and 35 people turned out for the first meeting. It shows that women do want to be affiliated with something."

Recently two women have been appointed to reach out to brides and new mothers, she says. The new mothers will be encouraged to get together with their children and brides will be offered a one-year membership.

"Once we introduce them to the organization, I know they will be committed. What we are doing is trying to meet the particular needs of Jewish women and bring similar-minded women together."

Kroft concedes that making time for a volunteer organization is not an easy task. "Women today are busy working and raising families, but they can prioritize. Everyone has the same number of hours in a day. Its what you do with them that is important.

"The days of women getting together on a week-day afternoon and having a relaxed meeting, are over. Meetings have become more streamlined. Members have learned to work smarter, not harder."

Among the organization's various projects are Youth Aliyah, which raises money for disadvantaged Israeli youth; the Woman to Woman Breakfast, which earmarks funds for women's shelters; and the ever-popular fall Hadassah Bazaar, which raises funds (often in the range of several hundred thousand dollars) for Israeli medical services and resources and usually attracts from 20,000 to 30,000 people.

"The secret of the bazaar's success is that the day it ends, next year's chair is looking for ways to improve it. She works so intently that you'd think her bazaar was next week. It is a year-long job and it is the highlight of our year. We have 90-year-old women who have never missed a bazaar. Three-thousand members working under one roof for the same cause is an amazing thing."

Kroft, who took a year off from her speech pathology practice when she became bazaar chair, says that when that year ended she was asked to be vice-president and she did not return to her practice. "Being president is a time and a half job. There is something going on every day. I know what I've signed on for, however, and I'm looking forward to the next two years. I'm going to savor every moment."

Benquesus takes over Sephardi organization

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jacques Benquesus

TORONTO — Although there is no official link between Toronto's Or HaEmet Sephardic School and Jerusalem's World Sephardic Educational Centre (WSEC), Jacques Benquesus would like to see one.

The 48-year-old Moroccan-born Toronto businessman – president of the former institution and president of the first international board of governors of the latter – is a strong proponent of Sephardi education.

Most Sephardi rabbis have been educated in Ashkenazi yeshivahs, he noted in a recent interview.

Although the WSEC doesn't currently grant smichah, education of Sephardi spiritual leaders is part of its mandate. "We want to educate them in Sephardic surroundings," said Benquesus.

The centre is not restricted to Sephardi Jews, he said, noting that about 10 percent of the participants at a recent international WSEC meeting were Ashkenazi. "Unless we can integrate Ashkenazim, they will never understand our needs or the beauty [of the Sephardi tradition]," said Benquesus.

The centre, which is "recognized by the Israeli government" but doesn't receive government funding, was founded in 1980 by José Nessim, a Paraguayan-born physician based in Los Angeles. Since then over 15,000 young adults, among them about 1,300 Canadians, have studied there.

The WSEC's three rented buildings in Jerusalem's Old City need about $5 million (US) in renovations, said Benquesus. Plans are to buy the buildings, which have a long Sephardi history, from the Israeli government and restore them.

Other plans include establishing a smichah program and obtaining accreditation for a one-year university equivalent program, said Benquesus, whose involvement with the organization dates back at least five years.

"We believe the youth is the future of the Jewish community," said Benquesus, a father of four and grandfather of two. "We have to be able to reduce intermarriage and assimilation."

He hopes to see Or HaEmet students go on to study at WSEC. His son Ruben, 20, will be a counsellor there this summer and his daughter Esther is president of Toronto's recently formed young adult chapter, with 350 members. Montreal's young adult chapter has 1,000 members, and the WSEC is looking to establish a presence in Vancouver, where there are an estimated 500 Sephardi adults, said Benquesus.

Worldwide, the organization has chapters in 12 countries.

Zuroff calls for boycott of Lithuanian ceremony

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Efraim Zuroff

TORONTO — One of Israel's foremost Nazi-hunters is urging Jewish organizations around the world not to participate in Lithuanian-government programs to mark the 200th anniversary of the death of the Vilna Gaon.

Efraim Zuroff, director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's (SWC) Israel office, says the Lithuanian government has not followed through on promises to bring Nazi war criminals to justice. On the contrary, he said, Lithuanians who have fled other jurisdictions to avoid the legal consequences of their crimes are finding refuge in the Baltic state.

Three of the nine former members of the 12 police battalion ordered out of the United States, Juozas Grabauskas, Antanas Mincikis and Juozas Budreika, have found refuge in Lithuania. In addition, Aleksandras Lileikis, the wartime head of the security police in Vilnius, fled his home in Norwood, Mass., when the media reported Israel was considering requesting his extradition for war crimes, Zuroff said.

Lithuania, which pledged to bring war criminals to justice, has turned a blind eye to their presence. In 1995, during a visit to the Knesset, Lithuanian president Algirdas Brazauskas promised that Nazi war criminals "would be prosecuted 'publicly, consistently and conscientiously,'" Zuroff said. "Since then, gur nicht (nothing), not a one."

What makes the situation even more egregious is that in May 1990, after Lithuania became independent of the Soviet Union, the government announced a rehabilitation program for former state (Soviet) enemies that included back pay and restoration of property. While the legislation specifically excluded benefits to perpetrators of war crimes, bureaucrats implementing the policy "don't check or don't care," Zuroff said.

The SWC exposed the fact that 12 former members of a killing squad were rehabilitated, Zuroff said. That revelation led to creation of a joint Lithuanian/Israeli commission, of which Zuroff is a member, to investigate the rehabilitation program's implementation. After checking 100 files in the Lithuanian archives of those being rehabilitated, "90 had participated in murders," Zuroff said.

Those results were passed on to the Lithuanian government with a request that action be taken, "but not a single rehabilitation has been cancelled."

The Lithuanian government is stonewalling requests for action because "there is widespread support for coverup." After Brazauskas promised action against war criminals and apologized to the Knesset for persecutions during the war, the Lithuanian press and public attacked him, Zuroff said.

So far, the World Zionist Organization has cancelled its participation in a Lithuanian government commemoration for the great rabbinic sage and Zuroff planned to meet with the American Jewish Committee, B'nai Brith International, the Anti-Defamation League, the World Jewish Congress and rabbinical organizations to suggest that they too forgo the official commemoration of the Sept. 9 anniversary.

He's also concerned that representatives of the Israeli government might participate in Lithuanian government programs and a meeting with the Israeli minister of education led to the promise that official representatives of the state would not participate unless action was taken against Lileikis, one of the most notorious of the Lithuanian war criminals.

Zuroff also planned to meet with U.S. congressmen in Washington. The United States has substantial leverage over Lithuania, which is seeking NATO membership as well as aid, he said.

Zuroff, whose family origins can be traced to Lithuania, is a member of the board of Association of Lithuanian Jews, which is based in Israel. He is seeking the assistance of Lithuanian Diaspora Jews and has travelled to South Africa, where many Lithuanian Jews emigrated, to rally their support.

Grabuaskas, Mincikis and Budreika (who has since died) were all members of the 12th battalion, a police murder squad. It was sent on Oct. 6, 1941 to Byelorussia (now Belarus) where it carried out bloody pogroms in Minsk and Slutsk. The Slutsk rampage was so egregious that the German officer in charge complained about their activities. The unit was responsible for the murder of 50,000 Jews in Byelorussia and before it was shipped out of Lithuania, it murdered thousands of Jews in Kaunas.

Lileikis served as head of the security police in Vilnius District and commanded a staff of 100. They turned over Jews to Lithuanian murder squads at Ponar where 70,000 were killed. Lileikis was in charge of ghetto security and administration and he signed orders turning over Jews for death.

He lost his U.S. citizenship in 1996 and shortly afterwards fled to Lithuania.

The test of the street

The courtroom of the Supreme Court of Canada is an elegant, dignified sanctum of polished wood and polished argument. No aspect of Canadian life is beyond the judges' reach. The nine justices are called upon to make decisions on matters that both touch the sublime of human existence and hover no higher than the mundane.

But regardless of their subject, all their decisions must pass the test of the street. They must make sense and be sensible to the majority of "ordinary" Canadians who lead unspectacular, law-abiding lives, who are reasonable people, understand fairness and cherish democracy.

Nothing will sooner or more decisively bring the law into disrespect than a decision which rests neatly on a theoretical framework, but which quickly collapses when touched by the common hand.

Last week, the court reserved judgment on the request by three alleged Nazi war criminals, Helmut Oberlander, Johann Dueck and Erichs Tobias, to have the deportation proceedings against them permanently suspended. The three were appealing the ruling of the Federal Court of Appeal, which refused to stop the proceedings.

The case has attracted much attention. It involves the now much-publicized, unfortunate lapse in judgment by a federal justice official who arranged a private meeting in March 1996 with the chief justice of the Federal Court to discuss the slow pace of war crimes proceedings in the charge of the Associate Chief Justice James Jerome.

Predictably, once the fact of that meeting became known, an even stickier web of further proceedings and further delays was spun in which the attempted deportations have now gotten stuck.

The lawyers for the accused men characterized the ill-conceived effort by the federal government to expedite the denaturalization and deportation proceedings as "an attack on judicial independence...unprecedented in Canadian history." "They sought to manipulate the judiciary in the backroom," said lawyer Don Bayne. The only appropriate remedy to the government's indiscretion, they argue, is to put a permanent halt to the process.

Without making light of the mistake by the justice official in failing to notify the defendants of his meeting with the chief justice and of the federal government's determination to see the cases move faster, the defendants' position makes no logical, or indeed, moral sense.

In recent weeks, the very same court directed a new trial in the "mercy killing" case involving Robert Latimer as a result of objectionable conduct aimed at the jury by the Crown attorney. The court did not throw out the proceedings. If in that case, in which the potential penalty to the accused is far graver than the "mere" possible deportation staring at the three accused Nazis, a stay was not ordered, how can one be warranted in this case?

Moreover, as chief justice of the Supreme Court, Antonio Lamer, correctly implied, an abandonment of the proceedings would effectively call into question the abilities of all Federal Court judges, as well as judges outside the Federal Court, to whom the cases could be directed, by imputing they were incapable of rendering fair and honest judgment. The indiscretion by the officials involved can and should be dealt with on its own merits without depriving the Canadian judicial system of the opportunity finally to deal fairly and honestly with the original allegations against the three accused men on their own merits.

We await judgment and hope that it will pass the test of the street.

Parents support Leah's lifestyle

Re: "NCSY scholarships help cement Jewish identity" (CJN, June 19).

My first problem with the article was the part about my entering Eitz Chaim in Grade 8, "against the wishes of my parents." True, they did not want me entering into a Jewish school at first. However, they have become unbelievably supportive of my decision especially when I decided to go to Bais Yaakov. They see how happy I am being there and how meaningful it's been for me. In fact, my parents went to the extent of publishing a two-page article in the Exodus (a Jewish Russian paper), expressing their joys about my becoming Orthodox and how proud they think my grandparents would have been if they could see me today.

My parents have constantly gone out of their way for me, whether it was agreeing on making my kitchen kosher or joining me at the Shabbat table so I wouldn't be alone. They even allow me to turn my kitchen "upside down" to kosher it for Pesach every year. I want people to know that my parents have been there for me and have supported me.

I also felt that Bais Yaakov was unfairly undermined and criticized. It was wrongly put in a bad light, making it seem like it was a school that only taught the "rules of Torah" and not the "nurturing and love of Torah." I would like to make it very clear that this statement is a real misunderstanding. Not only has my school shown me the love of Torah, but they are the ones who make me what I am today: a girl who is happy and proud of being Jewish. When I came to Bais Yaakov in Grade 9, I was confused and not sure of where exactly I was heading. However, my principal (Rabbi Stefansky) took it upon himself to help guide me on the right path.

I would just like to say that without the nurture and soft approach to Judaism that my school provided for me, I honestly don't know where I would be right now.

A 'traditional family' backs Leah

Thank you to Frances Kraft for her sensitive and well-balanced article (NCSY Scholarships help cement Jewish identity) (CJN, June 19). Having been associated with NCSY for over 30 years, we appreciate the community-wide recognition she has given to this aspect of the very important work NCSY does with Jewish youth.

Please allow us to alter an inaccurate conclusion that may be drawn from the comment that Leah Basin "entered Eitz Chaim School in Grade 8 against the wishes of her parents." In the five years which have passed since that time, Leah, her parents and her sister have been guests in our home on several occasions.

While the rest of the family continue to lead a "traditional" rather than an "observant" way of life, they certainly support very strongly the changes that Leah has made in her lifestyle. Leah leaves for Israel at the end of the summer with the full encouragement of her family, and we wish her a great year in every way.

Says Golem of technology is a rant

Shel Krakofsky's rant against computers (CJN, June 19) was so silly that its only value is the opportunity it provides to criticize widely held inanities.

If Krakofsky is so worried about the golem of technology, rather than let someone adjust his video player, why doesn't he just scrap it along with his phone, typewriter and car.

He might want to stop dealing with mailmen as well, since I hear that some of them receive their letters and packages by airplane. I guess that since planes were in existence before he was born they aren't hi-tech. They're simply B.S. (Before Shel) — like his article.

Lori Black had a fighting spirit

I read with interest that a community centre has been created in dedication to the memory of Lori Black (CJN, Montreal edition, June 26). Due to a close friendship with a member of her family, I had the privilege of meeting and getting to know Lori when she was seven years old. Despite her intellectual handicap, even at that young age Lori radiated with a sense of innate optimism coupled with a warm and loving personality. We developed nicknames for each other and Lori would bubble over with delight when we referred to each other by these special names.

As life moved on and so did friendships, I did not see Lori again for many years until I heard that she was in the hospital. I mustered my courage to visit her. Despite her being hooked up to a series of machines, all but paralyzed and barely able to communicate, Lori's sense of fighting spirit struck me. One could not avoid crying over this grave injustice.

With the dedication of the Lori Black Community Centre, the memory of this righteous, kind and loving human being will be forever honored.

Perspectives

Human rights, Judaism and the law

The following is excerpted from the text of the address by the author on being recently named the Lord Reading Society Human Rights Honoree for 1997, at a ceremony in Montreal.

By DAVID MATAS

Thank you for making me the Lord Reading Law Society Honoree for 1997. I appreciate the gesture. It encourages me to continue with my human rights work.

The Lord Reading Society, I learned tonight, was founded in Montreal in 1948 and named after the first Jewish member of the judicial committee of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom. The society was founded to combat discrimination against Jews in the legal profession in Quebec. It is heartening to see that the human rights work of the society continues and that the society's values endure in a larger arena, now that the discrimination which gave it birth has largely ended. I cannot persuade you of the need for human rights work, because you were already persuaded before I arrived.

Since this is an award given by an association of predominantly Jewish lawyers, I thought I would make some remarks about the connection of law and of Judaism to my human rights work. For me, the law has been a source of ammunition and of frustration. For many of my cases, the court room is the arena for a human rights battle. The law library is the arsenal from which the weapons are drawn. The arms are not just human rights law, but, as well, for the battles I have fought, administrative law, the law of evidence, the law of civil procedure, international law and criminal law.

I have been in private practice since 1973 and in those 24 years, I have been part of many victories and many defeats. In the case I argued of Fernando Molina in 1979, Justice Rhodes Smith of the Federal Court Trial Division held that reasons had to be given for the refusal of a refugee claim. Following that decision, Ron Atkey, then minister of immigration in the Tory government of the day, changed government policy and decided that reasons for refusals would be given in all refugee cases. That policy has now become a commonplace to the point where the duty to give reasons for a refugee refusal is written into the current Immigration Act.

In the case of Albert Helmut Rauca, in 1983 at the Ontario Court of Appeal, I intervened on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress, as did Irwin Cotler, who is here tonight. We intervened on the side of the Crown, arguing that an accused Nazi mass murderer who was a Canadian citizen could be extradited to stand trial in Germany despite the right to remain in Canada given to Canadian citizens in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Our arguments were accepted and Rauca was extradited to Germany, where he died in jail.

In the case of John Ross Taylor in 1989 at the Supreme Court of Canada, I intervened on behalf of B'nai Brith, as Irwin Cotler did on behalf of the Canadian Jewish Congress, to argue on the side of the Crown that provisions in the Canadian Human Rights Act prohibiting the use of the telephone to communicate hate speech were constitutionally valid despite the guarantee of freedom of speech in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The court accepted that argument, and upheld the ban on hate speech. Taylor went to jail for his refusal to abide by the banning order of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. That decision now looms in importance with the spread of hate speech through the Internet, since Internet communication is at its base telephone communication.

These were a few of our successes. But there were many failures. I learned that the law as a weapon in the battle for human rights is as likely to blow up in your hands as to hit its target.

In the case of Imre Finta, I intervened at the Supreme Court of Canada for B'nai Brith, to argue on the side of the Crown for a retrial. The Supreme Court of Canada nonetheless, in 1994, upheld Finta's acquittal, even though the trial judge had allowed Finta's counsel to put to the jury the defence that Finta was justified in shipping Jews off to Auschwitz crammed in cattle cars, because Finta genuinely believed prevalent Nazi propaganda that all Jews, including children, were traitors.

The prophets, carrying forward the message of the laws of Moses, were champions of human rights. Here we see an etching of the prophet Amos as imagined by Gustave Doré.

Though we like to link law and justice, the stark reality is that law is often the handmaiden of massive injustice, the sword of the oppressor rather than the shield of the oppressed. Doctors swear the Hippocratic oath, swear not to use their skills to harm and kill their patients. Lawyers take no such oath and often behave in no such way. The United Nations Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, adopted in 1990, state that lawyers shall seek to uphold human rights and fundamental freedoms. However, that duty is not part of the code of ethics of law societies in Canada. It is not part of the oath of office of judges.

Doctors will not take part in execution because it violates the Hippocratic oath to do so. Lawyers, on the other hand, just a few miles south of us in the United States, without hesitation prosecute death penalty cases and judges impose the death penalty, without the thought crossing their minds that it might violate their professional ethics. Lawyers in a frightening number of countries in the world offer evidence in court that is obtained by torture. Judges admit that evidence and base their findings on it, again without a twitch of professional conscience.

So, for me, in my pursuit of human rights, law has been ambivalent, sometimes a friend, as often an enemy. The ideal of law is justice. However, day to day justice is far from the reality. Law can be used and is used to inflict injustice. However, if the ideal of justice is ever to be realized, surely we lawyers must play an important part.

My Judaism is a different matter. It is at the core of why I am involved in the human rights battle. It is a source of commitment and determination.

I do not mean that I am inspired by the Jewish religious texts, although surely there is much there that is inspirational. Rather, what has sparked my dedication to human rights values is being part of the Jewish people, a people that was targeted for total extermination in the Holocaust during my lifetime.

Ishmael, in Herman Melville's novel, Moby Dick, ends his tragic tale of Captain Ahab and the ship Pequod by quoting from the book of Job, saying: "And I only am escaped alone to tell thee." Strictly speaking, I am not a survivor of the Holocaust, since all four of my grandparents came to Canada before World War I. Yet, in a very real sense, I and every Jewish person are survivors of the Holocaust. Six million Jews were killed. All Jews were targeted. It is only the fortunes of war that gave us an Allied rather than an Axis victory in World War II. If the Axis powers had won, not I, not one Jewish person would be alive today.

We only have escaped alone to tell the world. And tell the world we must.

If we can give any meaning at all to the meaningless slaughter of so many millions of innocents, we must learn the lessons of the Holocaust. But these are lessons we must learn ourselves. They will not descend from Heaven like the holy Jewish texts. They rather ascend from hell, the inferno of total conflagration from which the remnants of the Jewish community escaped. Elie Wiesel in his novel Twilight writes: "It may not be in man's power to erase society's evil, but he must become its conscience."

For the lessons of the Holocaust to have their greatest reverberation, for the deaths of the Holocaust to have their greatest meaning, we must avoid narrowing its focus in future just to "how to protect the Jewish community." We must learn the larger lessons of how to protect all humanity from its oppressors.

To say, never again, is easy. To make it happen is not so easy. The reality is since World War II, genocide has happened again and again, not to Jews, but to Cambodians, to Hutus, to Tutsis, to Bosnians, to Somalis and even more. In biblical times, God made a covenant with the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac and Jacob to make their descendants multiply like the stars in heaven and the sand upon the sea shore.

In modern times, after the Holocaust, after so many observant and non-observant, rabbis and scholars were murdered, the painful question must be asked: Where is that covenant now? But there are no answers.

Thus, in a secular world, we must make our own individual covenants with reality, to combat human rights violations wherever they are found. The fate of millions depends on it. That is a duty that falls on everyone, not just the Jewish people. But surely the Jewish people who have suffered so much and escaped so narrowly must learn that lesson first, must learn that lesson best.

The post-war international human rights movement began as a reaction to the Holocaust. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, the Genocide Convention of 1951, the Refugee Convention of 1951 were all adopted as so many attempted lessons learned from the Shoah. While the legacy of the Holocaust belongs to all humanity, if we who are Jewish put that legacy aside, how many others will take it up?

The lessons I have attempted to draw from the Holocaust are that we must prosecute, convict and punish mass murderers; ban hate speech; protect refugees; and never accept in silence gross violations of human rights, wherever they occur. Virtually all of my human rights work has been dedicated to acting on these lessons. I do not claim that these are the only lessons to be learned from the Holocaust, though I am partial to them. What I do claim is that the Jewish community cannot turn a blind eye to the Holocaust and lead our daily lives as if it never happened.

Opinions

Netanyahu's troubles

All is not well in the Likud. Dan Meridor's resignation from the finance portfolio last month was the most recent in a series of episodes that mark the unraveling of the historic Likud, and the disenchantment with Benjamin Netanyahu within its ranks and those of his coalition.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

In the Likud itself there are three different reactions to Netanyahu. The first is the disappointment of the ideologues. This reaction was best manifested in the resignation of Benny Begin from the cabinet several months ago, over the redeployment in Hebron. Begin Jr. is perhaps the last of the hardliners in the party. For him, any additional territorial concessions to the Palestinians are a betrayal of the party's historic commitment to a Greater Israel, even at the cost of renewed conflict with the Arab world. Begin is joined by former prime minister Yitzhak Shamir, who has said that he would not vote for Netanyahu if given the choice again.

The second reaction is that of those committed to due process and good government. Meridor is the chief proponent of this position and he is joined by another member of the older generation in the party, Moshe Arens, former minister of defence. Although Meridor and Netanyahu have never seen eye to eye on matters of style and operation, Meridor was a loyal lieutenant during the election campaign that brought Netanyahu to power. The ethically damning report of the attorney general over the Bar-On affair almost led to Meridor's resignation, but it took the personal affront of a blatant attempt to oust him from government to actually force his hand. Meridor, a popular and respected politician across the Israeli spectrum, has been upset with the workings of government since the last election. Arens, in turn, is apparently so disappointed with the performance of his former protégé that he has become an advocate of a repeal of the system of direct election of the prime minister — the very system that brought Netanyahu to power.

The third reaction is that of those who feel personally betrayed by Netanyahu's broken promises. Foreign Minister David Levy, leader of the Gesher faction in Likud and a historic rival of Netanyahu's for the leadership of the party, absented himself from the crucial no-confidence vote in the Knesset last week. After Meridor's resignation, Ariel Sharon, who was overlooked by Netanyahu in the first round of cabinet negotiations, upped the ante in his own bid for the Finance job. Limor Livnat, the feisty and talented minister of communications, has also been outspoken about her disaffection with Netanyahu's style.

The coalition also seems shaky at the moment. The Third Way, led by Avigdor Kahalani, minister of internal security, has been pressing Netanyahu for some time to move more aggressively on the Palestinian negotiations. They are now flirting with the idea of a new, right-of-centre bloc, along with Meridor. Minister of Trade and Industry Natan Sharansky, a personal friend of the prime minister, has also expressed misgivings about broken promises and the process of governance.

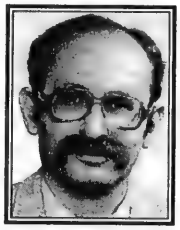
It isn't just the policy, and it isn't just the style — but, as always in politics, a combination of the two. Netanyahu came into office pledging to change the policy and style of the preceding government. In so doing, he finds himself, one year after his election, facing a disgruntled caucus and coalition. They do not necessarily have any significant recourse. In the current system, a successful no-confidence vote means new elections for prime minister and Knesset. Many politicians do not want to face that prospect for fear of losing the next time around. But Netanyahu's slim majority in the Knesset renders him vulnerable to the bolting of any of his partners, or, for that matter, the Levy faction inside Likud. There is talk of the preference for early elections inside Likud, and there is talk of "the Likud without Netanyahu."

In 1988, a groundswell of public disgust with the horsetrading involved in coalition negotiations resulted in a lengthy process of review of the electoral system, and ultimately in the decision, which many viewed as misguided, to reform the system to allow for direct election of the prime minister.

In 1997, the public seems indifferent to the machinations of the Netanyahu government. At the moment, public support for Netanyahu has not dropped significantly. I wouldn't write him off. Netanyahu has demonstrated his ability to take over the party, its administration, and its power bases — and to win the election. The power of his office is not insignificant and his desire to govern for a second term is overwhelming. The key question is whether the mishaps of the last few months will repeat themselves in what may be a fatal pattern, or whether he will outmanoeuvre his opponents yet again and remain in office for the duration of his term.

Principles for Jewish continuity programs

A recent issue of The Jerusalem Report included a two-page statement signed by a number of American Jewish academics, rabbis and communal leaders. The elegant manifesto set forth guidelines, and in effect boundaries, for acceptable continuity programs on the part of Jewish communal organizations.



By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The major impetus for this manifesto, as one of the main drafters told me, was to take exception to an "anything goes" mentality which has cropped up in efforts to combat assimilation. Too much New Age Judaism is not for this group — or for me. They warn of the possible dangers of being too inclusive when defining Judaic objectives for continuity programs.

The drafters set out five principles to guide any continuity efforts: Torah, am Yisrael, klal Yisrael (pluralism), brit (covenant) and keruv (outreach). Limitations of space preclude a detailed analysis of these themes. They say failure to adhere to these five would risk diluting continuity efforts, and by implication, the nature of American Judaism.

The drafters have had to walk a tightrope. On the one hand, they accept that pluralism (klal Yisrael) is a key ingredient of American Jewish life. And they further recognize that the future of American Judaism lies in the ability of Conservative and Reform Judaism to retain its members.

Yet they also recognize that there must be limits to what can legitimately be called Jewish. If everything is Jewish, then nothing is Jewish. They help open a useful debate on the future parameters of Jewish life. Since Judaism has no papacy, Jews of all persuasions will enter this hopefully civil discussion and shape the boundaries of effective continuity programs. But while the drafters were careful to focus their text on communal programs, the underlying issues remain those which animate the Who is a Jew? debate.

While they never identify efforts that they find faulty, they offer some clues. They emphasize a strategy of tipping the balance of outreach efforts to those who are already moderately affiliated — an "inreach" strategy — with which I also agree. (They would nevertheless continue some efforts aimed at disaffiliated or marginal Jews.) They would likely de-emphasize recent efforts at proselytization, reaching out to the "unchurched."

An example offered in the statement of excessive if well-intentioned inclusivity, is the idea of "giving an aliyah to a non-Jew." This example helps us ponder the limits of Judaic pluralism. All things being equal, there is no case for giving an aliyah to a non-Jew. Recall the joke about the Reform temple that is so liberal the rabbi is a gentile. But at times all things are not equal.

Consider the following. A liberal Reform temple includes among its congregants many individuals involved in mixed marriages. As part of a considered effort to bring the interested non-Jewish partner who is clearly open to conversion to experience more of Judaism, the temple offers them aliyot, along with their Jewish spouse. Such aliyot would not be frivolous, but would represent part of an outreach effort designed to more fully retain members and their children.

Are such outreach efforts deserving of contempt for threatening to dilute Judaism or to remove the religious stigma from outmarriage? One could argue that on the contrary, it is precisely the kind of experimental program parts of the Reform movement ought to consider, despite its risks.

Another case. Recently in Montreal, a secular Jewish organization requested financial support from the organized community to help establish a Jewish school. As an explicitly secular Jewish group, it is a throwback to an earlier period in this century. The evidence is clear that secular Jewishness in its earlier forms has not been able to sustain itself intergenerationally. Should this new group be denied communal financial support?

The individuals involved in the Montreal effort, like their counterparts elsewhere, are people who take their Jewish heritage and the Jewish community seriously. So too are some of the secular ex-Israelis living in North America, who might also risk being lost to the Jewish community if the five values listed above became the sine qua non for continuity or outreach efforts. While none of the above examples is my "glaizel" of tea, I am personally not prepared to exclude them — or their programs — from Jewish communal support.

There is nothing wrong with trying to enhance the effectiveness of continuity programs and to seek to define some minimal standards. But the debate on the limits of Jewish pluralism is far from over.

Samples of wisdom

Summer time provides many people with added opportunities for reading. Strange as it may seem, it was so in olden days as well, as some of our traditional sources tell us. That is why the readings from the Pirkei Avot (Sayings of the Fathers) were assigned, not only to the time between Pesach and Shavuot, but extended to Rosh Hashanah. Every Shabbat during this period, we are supposed to read one chapter — which takes less than 15 minutes (unless one reads a commentary along with it), and there is no question that these texts are not only delightful and memorable but also highly instructive.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

They come from six chapters in the Mishnah and are rules of life. They are, in their way, as up-to-date now as they were when they were committed to writing, which happened about the year 200 CE.

Take your prayer book and open it to the Pirkei Avot, which you will find appended to the Shabbat afternoon services (some prayer books contain selections at the beginning of the volume). Once you begin, you will keep on reading.

Most of these aphorisms begin by naming the author. But in the samples below, I will leave their names out for brevity's sake. The translation is by Rabbi Chaim Stern.

Get yourself a teacher; acquire a friend to study with you. When you judge people, give them the benefit of the doubt.

Be of the disciples of Aaron, loving peace and pursuing it, loving your fellow creatures, and drawing them near to the Torah.

If I am not for myself, who will be for me? But if I am only for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?

The world is sustained by three things: by truth, by justice and by peace.

Do not separate yourself from the community; do not be certain of yourself until the day you die; do not judge others until you are in their positions and do not say: "When I have leisure, I shall study" — you may never have that leisure.

In a place where no one behaves like a human being, you must try to be one.

Let your neighbor's honor be as dear to you as your own.

When two people sit and words of Torah pass between them, the Divine Presence rests between them.

One mitzvah performed leads to another, and one transgression leads to another.

Despise no one and call nothing useless, for there is no one whose hour does not come and there is no thing that does not have its place.

Do not try to placate your friends at the height of their anger; do not attempt to comfort them in the first shock of bereavement; do not question their sincerity at the moment when they make a solemn promise; do not be overeager to visit them in the hour of their disgrace.

These are just samples. Look at your prayer book for more sayings that will enrich your life. Of all your other summer reading, this one will last you longer than all the others. And if you are moved to take the next step, go to your synagogue or community library and take out one of the many commentaries on the Pirkei Avot.

The war just around the corner

For Saly Fromer, a Swiss Jew living in Basel, the conflagration

By Sheldon Kirshner

was next door. "We could hear the shooting between French and German soldiers," recalled the 75-year-old retired banker. "The war was just around the corner."

Fromer and his family lived five minutes by foot from the French border, and after Germany's invasion of France in 1940, World War II was no longer an abstraction for the residents of Basel, where the frontiers of Switzerland, France and Germany converge.

"If you looked over the Rhine River, you could see German soldiers," said Fromer, who, as Swiss army reservist, regularly exchanged his banker's suit for soldier's fatigues.

With Germany on the ascendancy in the second year of the war, there was real angst in Switzerland — a neutral — that its territorial integrity could be violated despite its extensive commercial links with the Germans.

"We trembled that Germany might invade Switzerland," said Fromer, whose parents were Polish Jews. "We were very frightened. We knew that if Germany came to Switzerland, it would be the end of the Jews in Switzerland."

Although Swiss newspapers were censored, Fromer was aware of the Holocaust and realized that a German occupation of Switzerland would immediately imperil its Jewish population.

Looking back almost six decades, Fromer remembers the Jewish refugees who streamed into Basel until 1942, the year the border was summarily closed by the Swiss authorities. To him, they were not merely faceless strangers. His mother hid an illegal refugee for two months. The migrant was permitted to spend the rest of the war in Switzerland.

All told, Switzerland allowed 30,000 Jewish refugees to enter the country during this period, but rejected an equal number. "It's quite clear that the government didn't do enough for Jewish refugees," he said. In his view, the Swiss government was anti-Semitic, driven by the fear that Switzerland would be overrun by Jews.

Fromer, however, believes that the vast majority of Swiss were not pro-Nazi. "Most of the people were against Germany and completely on the side of the Allies."

An island of tranquillity in a turbulent sea, Switzerland was spared the horrors of the war. Nevertheless, life was not easy, food rationing being the order of the day and mail delivery from the United States sporadic at best.

Jews could purchase kosher chickens from a Christian butcher in Basel. But most Jews bought their chickens live and had them koshered at the synagogue.

* * *

The war forced some Swiss Jews into morally unpleasant situations. Jacqueline Bloch, a Basel tour guide, said that her father, a soldier with the border patrol, requested a transfer to a different unit after he was compelled to turn away Jewish refugees.

* * *

Silvia Matile-Steiner, a spokesperson for the Swiss Bankers Association in Basel, projects a cool, unflappable demeanor in discussing the fate of unclaimed dormant accounts left behind by victims of the Holocaust. She has been interviewed by scores of journalists and can rhyme off her answers without missing a beat. But at the end of the interview, when the topic suddenly shifts to Switzerland's Jewish refugee policy, her tone changes and her features soften.

"I am ashamed of it," she declared unequivocally. "That's the darkest part of our policy, even if other countries were no better. Switzerland could have done more. I can't accept the argument that the boat was full."

When I asked her if Switzerland's attitude was colored by anti-Semitism, she appeared defensive. "The policy was determined by certain people in government and some of them may have been anti-Semitic," she replied, weighing her words.

Ulrich Schluer, 52, is mayor of Flaach, a bucolic village 35 kilometres northeast of Zurich. He is also a member of the federal parliament, representing the right-wing People's party, led by Christoph Blocher.

Of late, Blocher has been in the news, having gone on record as opposing a scheme by the Swiss government to establish a $4.7 billion (US) foundation to help the victims of oppression, poverty and the Holocaust.

Curious about his views, I requested an interview with Blocher. Since he was unavailable, I settled for a chat with Schluer, one of 29 People's party backbenchers in the 200-seat National Council.

Schluer, a historian by training, cites two reasons for his opposition to the foundation. It's an admission of guilt regarding Switzerland's wartime behavior. This he cannot accept. And he strenuously objects to financing it with gold from the Swiss National Bank. "The national bank," he observed, "must be independent from the political process."

Schluer strongly believes that Swiss voters will reject the idea in a referendum, likely to be held in 1998. But if they vote in favor of the proposed foundation, he will personally contribute to it.

Turning to another subject, Schluer described as "unreal" the assertion by the World Jewish Congress that Switzerland is sitting on $7 billion (US) worth of unclaimed Jewish assets. "I have no doubt that the real figure is $40 million," he said, referring to a figure released by the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA) to account for all dormant funds found so far. "I think the SBA conducted a careful audit, and I have the impression that Georg Krayer told us the truth." Krayer is president of the SBA.

In Schluer's opinion, the Swiss Jewish community has played a "very responsible" role as the Nazi gold controversy has inexorably unfolded. He rejects accusations that Blocher, his leader, is an anti-Semite. "Blocher is a fighter for the independence of Switzerland. He is very open-minded." And ideologically, he concluded, Blocher is a Swiss Ronald Reagan.

Francois Loeb, 57, has the distinction of being the sole Jewish member of Switzerland's federal parliament. A resident of Bern, the country's capital, he belongs to the Free Democratic party, an affiliate of the Liberal International.

An easy-going, self-effacing man, Loeb has been in politics since 1976, previously having served at the local and regional levels. He was elected to the National Council 10 years ago. Since then, he has been twice acclaimed as the most popular politician from Bern.

As well, Loeb is chief executive officer of the Loeb Group, a 116-year-old company which controls the smallest department store chain in Switzerland. In Bern, the Loeb establishment dominates a city block near the bustling railway station. The business, with 12 stores scattered throughout the country, was founded by his ancestors from Germany.

Loeb has connections to Canada. In 1966/67, he worked for Simpson-Sears' catalogue in Montreal, where his daughter, Nicole, was born.

On Israel's 40th anniversary, Keren Kayemeth shipped 40 Israeli cedar trees to Basel — site of the first Zionist Congress in 1897 — and had them planted in Bruderholz, one of Basel's poshest neighborhoods. Ten years on, the trees have grown, and Israel Park is still the only Keren Kayemeth forest (it is really a wood) outside Israel.

Campfire tales helpful in Israel

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

A campfire is a wonderful thing.

In the summer, when the days are longer and warmer, the evenings are a welcome time to relax and enjoy the cool air. So we make our way outdoors, light a fire, and with family and friends toast marshmallows and tell our stories (true and not so true...!)

In Israel, lighting campfires is a near national pastime and we use the opportunity to share our experiences and lives with others. We hope they will benefit from the lessons of our mistakes and can use the story of our lives as a foundation for their own.

For a Jew, a life is not just a life, but another link in the grand and epic tale of our people. This is why the story of Korach Ben Yitzhar in this week's parshah of Korach is one of the saddest stories in the Torah — because it is the story of a life gone to waste, of destroyed potential, of lost opportunities.

In life, many of us strongly believe that what we have to say is of incredible importance. And in the heat and emotion of our own opinions, we all too often fail to realize that others have ideas, opinions and approaches that may very well be totally alien to our own. But this doesn't make them wrong. Only different.

Indeed, in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers), we read, "Who is the wise one? It is the one who learns from all people." Thus, in the course of my rabbinic studies, I was taught a lesson I will never want to forget.

In the volumes of the Talmud that we study, there is a great deal of intense debate as to whether a particular law should be adopted as code. Yet, in spite of the clash of the great minds and great hearts of our holy sages, there is one thing that you will never read. You will read strongly worded rabbinic statements that begin with "In my opinion" or "I would think to say" or "It appears to me to be so," but no sage ever says, "This is the truth!"

Because in this world, truth is the most elusive of all targets. And in this lies the tragedy of Korach — that Korach insisted that he was the sole repository of knowledge. As the Torah tells us, "And he (Korach) stood up against Moses." (Bamidbar 17:2)

Korach assumed he was taking the high ground, but fortunately for us, the man he chose to battle against was a man who sought nothing for himself.

As Moses succinctly put it, "If only this whole nation were prophets!" He didn't want to go at it alone. Everything Moses did, spoke, thought and accomplished was for the sake of the Jewish people. He was, and remains, the prototypical leader.

As Korach angrily sowed the seeds of division, disunity and hatred, Moses patiently offered love, peace and understanding as the path to G-d.

In our Jewish world, we are replete with choice. We have Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and many other denominations. Each one believes that theirs is the authentic approach. But I argue that the only thing truly authentic is not the way we choose to practise Judaism, but the fact that we are Jewish. Leave us to make our choices and leave the judging to G-d. It is better to use our great energies as a people to build our sense of nation rather than destroy it. It is far better to tolerate than to condemn. Few have ever changed their minds through anger.

The stories that will be told about Korach around the campfire will only serve as a warning and not as an inspiration to us. Indeed, Korach's great sin was not the commitment to his cause, but his refusal to open his eyes and see that his way is not the only way.

While he will be eternally vilified, his descendants were given lofty positions in the ceremonies of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem. For they chose, unlike their forbearer, to be part of us and not apart from us. So should we all.

Rabbi Flanzraich is the spiritual leader of Pride of Israel Synagogue in Toronto.

Our views can influence prayers

BY RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Welcome to Midrashic Moments. I have found over time that my Thoughts for a New Moon, with its focus on women, has been growing and evolving. It became clear that Jewish life with its myriad of complexities could not be limited to one group or one gender. This monthly column will still appear at Rosh Chodesh and will still revolve around Jewish text and holidays.

Judaism encourages us to embrace a broad perspective on most issues; so once a month I invite you to share in a textual moment.

Included in the Torah portions for this month is the story of Bilaam. A Moabite king has hired Bilaam, a gentile prophet, to curse Israel. G-d has forbidden Bilaam to accept such a mission, but he attempts the journey nonetheless.

Along the way, there is an angel blocking his path whom he does not see, but his donkey does. After a most enjoyable exchange between Bilaam, his donkey and the angel, Bilaam arrives at the camp.

The king takes the prophet up one mountain where Israel can be seen in the valley below. Bilaam opens his mouth to deliver the curse, but instead a blessing results. The king is angry and suggests moving to a second mountaintop where only a portion of the Israelites can be seen.

On the second peak, Bilaam once again blesses Israel. The angry king moves Bilaam yet again and it is on this last mountaintop that Bilaam pronounces the words: "How goodly are your tents, Jacob, your dwellings, Israel," the very words which appear at the start of our siddur.

The story raises serious questions about God's communication with other nations and about the persona of a prophet. One can certainly question the spiritual integrity of a prophet whose donkey is more spiritually aware than he is. Yet the most pronounced absurdity seems to be the movement from mountaintop to mountaintop. If Bilaam was unable to curse Israel from one mountain, why change locations?

The story seems full of unexplained anomalies and unanswered questions. And yet it is the words spoken by the gentile prophet that we utter when we open a Jewish prayer book or enter a synagogue.

The answer may be found when one pictures the entire scene. The Israelites are in the valley below unaware of the intended curse. They remain unknowing and unchanging. Bilaam is being moved around above them in the hope that a change of perspective will result in a change of outcome. Each time he views Israel his perspective is changed, as is the outcome: the blessings become stronger with each occurrence. The text has given us an insightful glimpse at the unexpected outcomes that result from a change in view.

When we enter our synagogues to begin our prayers, we utter the words of Bilaam, the gentile prophet. Perhaps we understand how prayer can influence our perspectives or how our views can influence our prayers. When a problem seems insurmountable, perhaps all we require is another mountaintop.

Parents must teach concept of morality

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Is there something about young people that makes them resist the kind of authority that is inherent in Judaism? On this point, we find a very telling incident recorded in I Kings, chapter 12, which tells the story of Rehayam, who was the son of King Solomon and became king after him.

Rehavam, faced with possible civil strife in the wake of his father's system of heavy taxation, goes out and seeks advice of his cabinet, as it were. First he turns to his elderly advisors, and they tell him to eradicate the taxes, to tear down the heavy burden that Solomon had placed upon the people. They counsel caution — don't be brazen or arrogant, they tell him, take the long view.

Then Rehavam turns to his younger counsellors, the young turks. They are bold, not afraid of the future, unable to foresee any consequences to their actions. So what do they tell him? Keep the taxes up, keep the pressure on, don't worry about tomorrow.

And Rehavam heeds the advice of his young counsellors and maintains the heavy taxes. The consequences are that the northern tribes of Israel eventually rebel and form their own kingdom, separate from Judea, a catastrophic blow to national unity and the beginning of the end for Jewish sovereignty at that time.

And what does the Talmud say about this? It says: "If young people advise you to build and elders tell you to tear down, listen to the elders, for their breaking apart of things is, in truth, constructive, while the 'building up' of youth is really equal to destruction. The proof of this is Rehavam."

What is the Talmud telling us about the nature of youth? Young people, at almost any age, want to display independence and seek out their own path, as they look to explore the world and test its limits. They do not always factor in the long-term repercussions of their choices; so, young people, even under the guise of "building up," i.e. discovering themselves, can walk a non-productive path, if their energies are not tempered with a sound moral vision.

Young people seek out their own path

In other words, children must be tamed, to borrow the expression from The Little Prince. Parents must not be afraid of transferring a strong Jewish concept of morality to their children. Because if we don't, there's going to be a lot tugging at them in the other direction, a huge marketplace of ideas and temptations that await them in the outside world, and that child is an instant candidate for opting out of Judaism. We should not be surprised by that turn of events. We should be prepared.

My old political theory professor, the late Allan Bloom, author of The Closing of the American Mind, often used to argue that the university today no longer contributes to the moral development of young people, and the reason is that openness — the idea that every value that people hold dear is of equal significance — has become the credo of every young person. The only absolute value that many people in the West today maintain is ironically, that there are no absolute values. Everything is relative to one's culture, one's upbringing, one's point of view.

Bloom's observation, it seems to me, is profoundly true and tells us a great deal about why Judaism, with its series of dos and don'ts, meets such resistance in an open society and appears to be authoritarian to so many young people. In my next column, we'll offer some practical suggestions for softening such resistance and helping children create their own Jewish future.

Time to hop aboard the Internet express

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Summer is here. And that means it's time to say good-bye to work or school, even turn off the computer and go on vacation. So to help you get ready for your travels, here are a few places to visit on the Jewish Highway before you hit the real one.

If you are planning to visit any of the four corners of the earth, start your preparations at the World Jewish Congress' Jewish Communities of the World [http://www.virtual.co.il/communities/wjcbook/]. In addition to copious information about major Jewish communities, you'll find out that Tahiti's Jewish community of 120 has a new synagogue in Papeete that was consecrated in 1993. And that "the Santiago community maintains a volunteer fire department, called 'Bomba Israel.' Among the fire-fighters are several rabbis, and the two fire engines fly both Chilean and Israeli flags." Also see Am Yisrael [http://www.amyisrael.co.il/].

Even if you have no travel plans, you can still tag along on a vicarious voyage. There are several interesting sites where travellers have published their journals. You can follow Australian Rabbi J. Hershy Worch as he "peddles his spiritual wares in the African outback, to a community of Jewish converts hungry for every morsel of Jewish learning" at [http://www.jcn18.com/uganda/].

David A. Chapin tells of his travel experiences in Ukraine [http://www.ncc.com/dvjcc/ukraine.html]. And Calvin Sims of the New York Times tells of his visit to the fascinating town of Moises Ville, Argentina [http://www.latinolink.com:80/life/0430ljew.html]. Although Jews now make up only 15 percent of the town's 2,000 residents, Moises Ville is still permeated with the Jewish culture introduced by European Jews who came to Argentina a century ago.

Singapore's Raphael Meyer says, "It would be a pity to miss the opportunity to visit the magnificent Synagogues in the region and all the vast heritage that these Jews have to share." So he designed the Jews from Asia site [http://www.kashrus.org/asian/asian.html]. This is a comprehensive site with valuable travel information for Jewish travellers to India, Indonesia, Thailand, Japan, China, Singapore, the Philippines and Hong Kong. After reading these essays about Jews in the most surprising locales, G-d's proclamation in Ezekiel 22:15, has special resonance: "I will scatter you among the nations, and disperse you through the countries." [http://bible.ort.org/bible/htm/leviticu/haft/1KEDOS7.HTM].

Next week I shall write about some travel sites closer to home.

Greenberg concerned about 'split' in community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Irving Greenberg, who to the chagrin of his right-wing colleagues is an outspoken proponent of Jewish pluralism, appeared for a brief moment to be dodging an interview question. That wasn't the case. An amused — perhaps rueful — laugh merely preceded his thoughtful answer.

Yitz Greenberg, as he had introduced himself, turned out to be direct, unpretentious and politely but unflinchingly critical of some of his Orthodox colleagues during a recent hour-long interview, praising the pioneering outreach efforts of groups like Lubavitch and Aish HaTorah while lamenting their contribution to divisiveness among Jews, as he perceives it.

"They have strengthened the hand that says there's no legitimacy to any other groups. It has tilted the balance...The side effect is that the modern Orthodox position has been shunted aside."

The question concerned Rabbi Greenberg's views on pluralism, which he promotes through CLAL – The National Jewish Centre for Learning and Leadership, the New York-based organization he co-founded in 1972. Has his philosophy changed since his 1953 ordination as an Orthodox rabbi, or has the rest of the Orthodox world just become more right-wing?

"A little bit of both," he conceded.

Unlike many of his colleagues, Rabbi Greenberg, 64, who was in town recently as a guest speaker at (the Conservative) Beth Tikvah Synagogue, espouses accepting non-Orthodox expressions of Judaism as legitimate.

Considered a leading Jewish thinker, the rabbi — who has a PhD from Harvard University — is president of CLAL, where he brings together Jewish leaders from every sector of the community for dialogue.

Born in the United States and raised in an Orthodox home with "a real sense of openness and respect for others," Rabbi Greenberg said it wasn't until the 1960s that his pluralist philosophy of acceptance, not mere tolerance, began to jell.

Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg

One of the factors was contact with non-Orthodox rabbis "of a very high calibre...You come to see their dignity and authenticity. It moved me from being just a liberal to being a pluralist."

Unfortunately, he added wryly, his transformation coincided with the general trend of Orthodoxy in the opposite direction. "It has caused great strains."

Some Orthodox rabbis would deny Rabbi Greenberg's status as a colleague, believing he has crossed a line, he explained. Others believe he's "wrong but we have to be tolerant because he does some good things too."

While the rabbi doesn't agree with all the changes introduced by the Conservative and Reform movements, particularly regarding the pace of change and the underlying authority, he is most positive about others.

"I think they will be seen in retrospect as pioneering new roles for women. In some cases I think they went too far, [but] I'm willing to learn from them.

"I think they have a lot to learn from the Orthodox, it goes without saying," he added.

Given recent trends, he fears the Jewish community is "heading for a split."

He has often been told by Jewish parents they would rather their daughters married non-Jews than Orthodox Jews. "This is a tragedy. Some people have become so assimilated that it's less disruptive to their lives to marry a non-Jew than an Orthodox one.

"I say to Orthodox Jews, 'What are you doing that gets people so angry?'"

At a UJA Federation lecture earlier that day, he said assimilated Jews must be persuaded, not coerced, into believing that Judaism is worth holding onto, or else the community will lose them.

He urged Jews to become more knowledgeable about Judaism and suggested incorporating Jewish values into the workplace and home.

The rise in religious fundamentalism over the past two decades, both within and outside the Jewish community, has been a reaction to unprecedented freedom to assimilate, the rabbi told The CJN.

It's not the right alternative, he argues, in part because it means "writing off 90 percent of the Jewish people."

And you can't really shut out the world, he noted. "I think the Torah is eternal. That means it not only lives forever, but it has to apply in every culture."

As a pluralist, Rabbi Greenberg thinks the ultra-Orthodox viewpoint "should be treasured," but not to the extent that "modernity becomes deligitimated."

He doesn't see the future as totally bleak. "There's [still] some health in the Jewish community. Probably the single most important thing that would help would be for the Modern Orthodox to reassert themselves, but it hasn't happened yet. I think we need emissaries of pluralism in every community."

Farber meets with police recruits

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sensitivity he found among 250 police recruits to hate crime is "heartening," says Bernie Farber, national director of community relations at Canadian Jewish Congress.

Farber spoke recently at the Ontario Police College, Aylmer, at the invitation of Rudy Gheysen, deputy director. On the same panel two women from London spoke on victimization of women.

It was the first time Farber spoke to such a large group of police candidates, and he said he was impressed at the attitude of these recruits who come from all over Ontario

The recruits, from village, town and city forces as well as the Ontario Provincial Police, were all university or college graduates and at least 25 percent were women, Farber said.

They are taking a two-month course at the college before going on the beat in their home towns and cities.

The questions Farber faced were insightful and represented a willingness to enforce the law against hate crimes, he said.

"I tried to draw a picture for them of how a member of a minority group feels when victimized and why a community is so devastated when there is a crime within its racial or religious group."

Though he was impressed with the number of women who were accepted as recruits, Farber said, "I didn't see many people of color. They still have a long way to go on that."

Among the questions he was asked were what is required of a police representative on entering the home of an Orthodox Jew and/or entering a synagogue or temple. "They particularly wanted to know when they should keep their hats on."

Community activist Shulman says goodbye to Congress

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ordinarily, Steven Shulman would be too young to have seen it all.

Only 32, Shulman is all too familiar with the world of white supremacists, hatemongers, neo-Nazi propagandists and mayhem-creators bent on fomenting racial divisions. For four years, he served as associate national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress as well as assistant legal counsel, at a time when the organization was on a full-blown offensive against those who would torment the Jewish community and set racial groups against each other.

But recently, Shulman cleaned up his desk and said goodbye to that world, returning to private legal practice where he hopes to build a practice in immigration law, civil litigation and general business law.

It was an amicable separation for Shulman and Congress, with Shulman feeling it was simply time for a career change. He looks back on his tenure at Congress with some satisfaction, believing progress was made on a number of fronts where the protection of the Jewish community's interests were concerned.

His former colleague, Bernie Farber, national director of community relations, says "we're going to miss him. His legal background was of incredible use to us...He is a consummate professional. He has a grasp of issues and he speaks well."

With his background in law and his skill as a public speaker, Shulman played a significant role in preparing legal briefs, conducting research and articulating the views of Congress to public groups, government inquiries, the media and the general public.

He counts his work on the Somalia dossier, working with the Sikh community on the turban issue, opposing hate crimes and pressing for more fervent government action against war criminals as his most satisfying activities.

Not surprisingly, responding to the propaganda disseminated by Nazi-apologist Ernst Zundel was one of Shulman's first tasks — something that has kept community-protection groups busy for years. At the time, Zundel was using satellite transmission stations in the United States and short wave radio broadcasts to spread his gospel. Congress was at the forefront of those who convinced the stations to drop Zundel's programming. Although faced with a strong argument on U.S. First Amendment (free speech) bases, Congress argued running the shows "was beneath the dignity of these stations," Shulman said.

Shulman points proudly to his part in Congress' efforts to bring the issue of Nazi war criminals to the government's front burner. In January, 1995, he recalls, he participated in a meeting in which Justice and Immigration officials told a group of Jewish leaders they would initiate only four cases and wait until precedents were set before proceeding with more.

Steven Shulman

"Their initial position was indefensible. It was like them saying, we know there are many rapists and killers, but we only have the resources and precedents to deal with four," Shulman said.

Since then, with continued pressure from the Jewish community and with the embarrassment generated by U.S. investigator Steven Rambam's high profile interviews with Nazis, the government appears to be increasing its commitment to the issue. "It has been painstakingly slow since then, but we have managed to have our voice heard and it's had an impact," he says.

Shulman is particularly proud of his work in preparing the Congress legal documents for the inquiry into the Somalia affair. Congress, he noted, was granted full standing at the inquiry to address the issue of racism in the military.

"This is the story of a military culture, from leadership on down, that did not pay attention to racism right up to the Somalia deployment," he said. One of the inquiry's more dramatic moments came when a sergeant in charge of discipline, under cross-examination by Congress lawyer Keith Landy, said he was unconcerned by manifestations of neo-Nazi sympathies among soldiers of the Airborne Regiment.

Shulman was also deeply involved in advocacy for the rights of Sikh veterans to wear turbans in Canadian Legion halls and with the Toronto Muslim community's bid to erect a mosque in East York.

Working with these groups provoked an interest in immigration issues and brought him back to the law, he said. At Congress, "I honed my advocacy skills and it re-awakened my interest in private practice."

A one-time winner as a youth of BBYO's International Oratory Contest, Shulman went on to study political science and then the law. Working at Congress afforded him the opportunity to apply his idealism, his legal education and advocacy skills to issues that concerned him.

"I had a good experience working with top people in the law and political advocacy. That's the kind of experience that's difficult to get," he said.

While he's left the organization, he continues to believe that "from a resources standpoint, the community must put more into political advocacy...If we're to continue to play a leading role in this country into the 21st century, we need the stable and even increased funding for advocacy," he said.

Students praised at She'arim brunch

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Although three politicians were the official honorees at Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School's recent annual brunch, it was the students, parents and teachers who received the most praise.

When called to speak, Ontario attorney general Charles Harnick, former solicitor general Robert Kaplan and Herb Gray, deputy prime minister of Canada, all acknowledged the hard work and dedication of the various factions of the school.

"I have been involved with She'arim in a small way, but it has allowed me to see what you do every day. [The school] is a special place because of the children and community it serves and its curriculum," said Harnick. "It reflects the things to which we in the Jewish community strive — recognizing the needs of everyone."

Kaplan referred to the saying, "Sticks and stones can break my bones but names can never hurt me," and said that "the conventional wisdom is false. Words can humiliate a youngster and they can stick to them for life. From a young age, it matters to a child to be treated with dignity and respect." She'arim treats them like that, he said.

Gray commended She'arim teachers and parents for "recognizing human potential in each and every way. It would be a loss if there were no She'arim to bring out this potential."

The proverbs, he said, command students to "apply thy heart unto instruction [and that is what they do].

"There is a synergy between parents, teachers and students that brings out the best in everyone. I am honored by the cause served by this brunch and by the school."

Three 1997 graduates, Michelle Hausman, Mordechai Soroka and Adam White, spoke of their positive learning experience at She'arim and former student Avi Deutsch, now an architectural student at George Brown College, praised the school for helping him get this far in his education. A musical presentation by She'arim students was led by Ruth Zwilling Ohayon.

South African immigrants gather for school reunion

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Student Intern

TORONTO — Former students of King David High School flew from all over North America, England, South Africa and Australia to attend the school's reunion held recently in Thornhill.

Close to 550 people ate, danced, prayed and reminisced at the reunion of the King David schools, two Jewish day schools in Johannesburg, South Africa.

"The naughtiest little boys in class turned out to be the real successes in life...A lot of friendships were renewed and people enjoyed showing their family and children to the people they were at school with," says Heather Super, the coordinator of the Toronto Committee of King David Alumni of North America.

Super says Toronto has the largest concentration of King David alumni in North America and that a large number of them live in Thornhill.

The weekend's events included a Friday night service at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, a weekend-long open house "meet and greet" event at the Sheraton Parkway Hotel on Highway 7, a Sunday morning brunch at Le Parc in Markham and a Sunday night grand gala dinner dance.

Graduates, from 1957 to the most recent class of 1997, attended the reunion of what Super says is "the largest Jewish day school in the Southern hemisphere."

The guests of honor were Norman Sandler, who started the high school and was principal from 1954 to 1973; Elliot Wolf, the current principal of the Linksfield campus; and his twin brother Jeffrey Wolf, who is the current principal of the Victory Park campus.

What is so special about the reunion is that while the South African community has scattered all over the world, they were brought together for this weekend, said Edna Lipworth, a 1979 graduate of the King David Victory Park campus.

"There's a huge pocket [of South African immigrants] in Sydney, Australia, there's huge pockets all over the States and there's obviously a lot of us here in Toronto. So a reunion is a momentous occasion because we don't ever imagine that we can [be] like other schools in North America where a reunion is taken for granted," she said.

Pamela Dennill, a 1972 graduate of the Victory Park campus who attended the school from Grade 1 to matriculation (Grade 12) and was a previous teacher at the school, said the high'ight of the weekend was the "camaraderie and the sense of loyalty that was displayed amongst the ex-Davidians...even though we hadn't seen each other in well over 20 years."

Super said next year there will be a King David alumni reunion in Israel and since King David was established in 1948, it will be sharing Israel's 50th birthday. In the year 2000, Super predicts a reunion in California.

When asked about the prospect of another King David reunion in either Toronto or another part of Canada, she said, "Eventually, we'll have another one, but it will take a few years before the cycle turns and it comes back here".

Parents, kids' problems said not the same

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents must develop the confidence that they know what is best for their children, and act accordingly, says psychiatrist Harvey Armstrong, executive director of Parents for Youth.

Armstrong recently spoke at Westmount Collegiate in Thornhill at a program, Parents Under Siege: challenges of parenting your adolescent, sponsored by the school and by the York Region office of Jewish Family & Child Service.

The best asset a child, especially a child in trouble, can have, Armstrong said, is a parent who is committed to him, but who "doesn't feel that he owns the child's problems. He doesn't insist on fixing things for the child, but helps him without indignation, guilt or fear."

What he has found, he says, are that "children are choking from overparenting. Parents and kids need help disentangling themselves from each other."

We respond as if their problems are our problems, Armstrong said, and our dreams are their dreams. "We have to let that go."

The role of parents, Armstrong said, "is to help their kids control themselves, and to show them what the consequences of their actions are."

Parents are used to being blamed for everything that their children do, he said. "They devalue themselves. They are so fearful of other peoples' anger (their children's anger included) that the very act of setting boundaries is terrifying."

Yet, he said, boundaries must be drawn. "It is a myth that love is enough. There must be structure too."

Many parents tolerate treatment from their children that they wouldn't — and shouldn't — accept from anyone else, Armstrong said.

The consequences of a teenager's actions change as the child gets older, he said. "If a child doesn't get in until the middle of the night, you may have to lock the door and make a date to see him in two days. If a child is OK out until 4 a.m., he will be OK for the rest of the night."

Armstrong skirted the question posed from a member of the audience concerned about the danger to children, especially daughters, locked out of the house all night.

He had other suggestions for consequences for older teens: Don't cook unless you are given 24 hours notice that they will be home; disconnect the television; lock telephones in the trunk of your car.

"It takes ingenuity," he said.

Professionals are as guilty as anyone of blaming parents for their children's problems. "There are thousands of articles on that. But there are only two articles in all the literature on the effect of difficult kids on parents."

One problem teenagers have to deal with, Armstrong said, is the realization that their parents are no longer the ideal people the children once thought they were. Parents too have to deal with that, "and we become offended when our children treat us as just human beings."

Darchei Noam helps Afghan family

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last December while attending a social event, David Mendelsohn was approached by a former student with panic in his voice.

His brother, the student explained, had just phoned from Pakistan and was frantically requesting help in getting the family out of Afghanistan, away from the Taleban militia that had taken over the government.

Not knowing where to turn, the student, "Jay," asked his former teacher if he could help. Mendelsohn, a professor of English as a second language, agreed to look into the case.

Now, months later, Mendelsohn has succeeded in enrolling the support of his congregation at the Darchei Noam synagogue. Four of his friends have agreed to co-sponsor the family while the shul has publicized the situation in its in-house periodical and the synagogue was recently used for a fundraising musical evening.

In addition, Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker, the congregation's spiritual leader, has agreed to make his discretionary fund available for contributions to help the family.

Rabbi Pinsker's help has been invaluable and the congregation's support greatly appreciated, said Mendelsohn, who's dubbed the effort Project: To Save One Life. It's named after the Mishnaic verse that suggests if you save one life, it is as if you had saved the world.

Following his conversation with Rabbi Pinsker, Mendelsohn got in touch with an immigration lawyer who in turn discussed the case with Immigration Canada. In the wake of those conversations, Mendelsohn found the five people who would serve as joint guarantors for the family. In addition $25,000 will have to be raised: $1,000 immigration tax per person; $9,000 for airfare for the family of six; and $10,000 to aid in their settlement. So far, $13,000 has been raised.

While all this was going on, Jay's family paid smugglers to shepherd them through mountain passes into Pakistan, where three million Afghan refugees have fled. The family is well-known in Afghanistan but Mendelsohn and Rabbi Pinsker warned that publishing details of their lives could help identify them. Even in a Pakistani refugee camp, they are not safe from possible Taleban retribution, they said.

Coming to the aid of a Muslim family is unusual for Darchei Noam, which often does get involved in "worldly" concerns, Mendelsohn said.

"There's been a wonderful response in the shul," with people contributing sums ranging from $500 to $10, he added.

Rabbi Pinsker said the plight of Jay's family brought to mind a Holocaust memorial he attended in Manhattan seven years ago. At that time, the keynote speaker, Benjamin Meed, president of the Warsaw Ghetto Resistance Organization, repeated the slogan "never again."

That should be applied broadly and not just to Jews, Rabbi Pinsker said.

Minorities in Afghanistan are subject to some of the same indignities that Jews suffered under the Nazis. They are made to wear distinctive clothing to mark them as a humiliated group and their women are forbidden to practise certain professions that had been open to them.

"The echo of the Holocaust is powerful," Rabbi Pinsker said.

As for Mendelsohn, he felt he had to do something once the student "came to me in a panic. What could I do? I felt I had to try to save their lives."

"Just Between Us"

גידי קורן וחברים

קנדה, אביב 1897:

"לגידי קורן שלום רב, אני קורא את המאמרים שלך בCJN כבר הרבה זמן ובדרך כלל מאוד אוהב את מה שאני קורא. בהמלצתך קראתי ספרים שנהניתי מהם מאוד וקיבלתי מידע גם על מה שקורה בישראל, אבל אף פעם לא על מה שקורה כאן! בטורונטו, בקרב בני הקהילה הישראלית, הדרכים שונות, ולפעמים כל המרבה הרי זה משובח. כל האירגונים ותתי האירגונים, שבמקום לעודד השתתפות עוסקים בהתנצחות ותחרותיות וחבריהם שוכחים שהמטרה היא לאחד ולא לפלג את הקהילה. אם קיים עיתון עצמאי בעיר קמים חברי אירגון מסוים ומוציאים עלון משלהם במטרה להתחרות. נכון שאומרים כי תחרות היא יפה ומפרה, אך במקרה זה אף אחד מן העיתונים לא שומר על איזו שהיא איכות. אילו איחדו את כל הגורמים האלו אולי אפשר היה לקבל עיתון על רמה. לכל אירוע שמתקיים בקהילה יש תומכים ויש מתנגדים וכל אחד משווה את הפעילות של אירגונו לפעילות שיכולה היתה להתקיים אם חברי האירגון המתחרה היו "בני אדם". בברכה והרבה כבוד, יהושע גינצבורג ריצ'מונדהיל" -

War crimes cases heard by Supreme Court

"If this isn't the clearest of cases to invoke that [principle], there is none," Bayne said.

At stake before the High Court is the future of denaturalization cases brought by federal authorities against Dueck, Helmut Oberlander and Erichs Tobiass. They are alleged to have lied about their wartime participation in Nazi-led murder squads.

A March 1 meeting between Justice Department official Ted Thompson and Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac, in which Thompson complained about the slow pace of proceeding, touched off the stay application. Lawyers for the three men claim the meeting, and subsequent meetings, interfered in the judicial process and gave the appearance of a biased court.

Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen granted their application for a stay, but he was reversed by the Federal Court of Appeal. An appeal from that decision was before the Supreme Court last week.

During the three-hour hearing, Bayne and Michael Code, who represents Oberlander, were repeatedly questioned on their contention that a stay was the only appropriate remedy.

Justice Beverley McLachlin asked whether improper behavior would necessarily mean "we don't want to deal with this case."

Chief Justice Antonio Lamer asked whether meetings between Isaac and Thompson tainted all the other judges in the Federal Court.

Justice Peter Cory wanted to know whether other judges, who have taken a solemn oath of office, could provide the men a fair trial

Bayne told the justices that "an attack on judicial independence on this scale is unprecedented."

The March 1 meeting was not just about delay. Federal prosecutors were so unhappy with Associate Justice James Jerome, who was hearing the three cases, that they wanted him removed, Bayne said.

Jerome later recused (removed) himself but that recusal was "effected this private, back door way," he added.

Code said his client was apprehensive that he could not receive a fair trial. He also suggested the meetings created a "subconscious bias" among Federal Court judges.

Ian Binnie, who represented the Crown, said justice demands examining issues other than the meetings in question. The three alleged war criminals should be held accountable for their conduct. Other judges of the Federal Court must be treated fairly and not tainted with the suggestion they could not dispose of the cases without bias, he said.

Binnie suggested defence lawyers were hypocritical in arguing the March 1 meeting tainted the court even though they had been willing to allow Jerome to continue with the case after they learned of the meeting. In addition, Cullen, who ordered a stay, did not seem affected by interference.

Ed Morgan, representing Canadian Jewish Congress, the only intervener in the case, said in weighing the gravity of the misdeeds relating to the March 1 meeting, the High Court should also consider the gravity of the allegations against the three men.

"These proceedings commenced with allegations that these three individuals are alleged to have concealed their membership and activities in some of the most heinous organizations that the international community has ever known. We are talking here about Nazi death squads and their surrogate death squads in Eastern Europe," he said.

Giving the issue a Canadian spin, Morgan suggested the judges consider a situation in which double-murderer Paul Bernardo somehow had slipped into the United States and a justice official there met with a judge to express concern over the slow pace of proceedings.

"Would we be standing here now in Canada saying justice demands that Bernardo live freely in Vermont or New York?" he asked.

"The administration of justice in Canada will suffer a tremendous blow if it turns out that we cannot proceed with these proceedings."

Pol Pot trial divides community

suggest Pol Pot has been captured by his former Khmer Rouge allies.

Abella, who chairs Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee, said Canada is one of the few countries in the world with legislation allowing for criminal prosecution for acts committed outside its territory.

The purpose of such a prosecution would be "to teach us and remind us of man's inhumanity to man and how little we have progressed in the 20th century," Abella said.

Matas, who has represented B'nai Brith Canada on war crimes issues, said the organization had not taken an official position on the Pol Pot case either. But he believes that if the Criminal Code were strengthened, Pol Pot could be successfully prosecuted in Canada. Under current law, "Pol Pot could raise the defence that was set out in Finta and put it to the jury that he didn't have a guilty mind because he believed the people he killed were his enemies, based on the propaganda that he read," he said.

Matas suggested a permanent international court be established to prosecute cases involving human rights violations.

Sol Littman, spokesperson for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said Pol Pot "deserves to be tried" if he were to come to Canada, but Canada need not make any particular effort to bring him here. Trying him before an international tribunal would be a better solution. Canada need not be in the business of trying all alleged war criminals, he said.

Bert Raphael, spokesperson for the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation, agreed that bringing Pol Pot before an international tribunal would be the best solution.

"My first reaction is that the Americans are probably passing the buck," but they don't have the enabling legislation that Canada possesses to try extraterritorial crimes, he said.

Should Pol Pot be brought to Canada, "there is the danger that his case could be mired the way our Nazi war crimes cases are."

Raphael suggested the United Nations extend the jurisdiction of the international court already trying Yugoslav war crimes cases to take on the Pol Pot case.

IGTO's Ben-Tzur completes term as tourism representative

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — After five years as director of the Israel Government Tourist Office here, Ruth Ben-Tzur is about to do something that she has helped persuade thousands of Canadians to do: pack her bags and leave for Israel.

Ben-Tzur, however, is going to Israel, not on holiday, but for good, having completed a term as perhaps Israel's most effective tourism representative in Canada to date. Her success seemingly has as much to do with the peace process as it does with her own considerable marketing skills and powers of persuasion.

Until five years ago, Canadian travellers to Israel did not exceed 40,000 annually in any given year except 1985, in which 45,000 made the trip. Since then, the annual number of Canadians to Israel has surpassed 50,000 several times — in 1995 it reached 52,000 — at least partly because Ben-Tzur managed to convince major tour operators like Regent Holidays and Sunquest of the profitability of offering smartly priced packages to Israel, and Air Canada of the good sense of inaugurating a new service to Tel Aviv in competition with the Israeli national carrier, El Al.

"When you're promoting a destination, the first thing you need is accessibility," Ben-Tzur explained recently. "We managed to get the biggest tour operators involved with Israel, but we found we couldn't expand the market with these big players if we were stuck with only 500 or 600 airline seats a week. That was very limiting. People can't swim to Israel."

Roughly one-third of Canadian travellers to Israel are Jewish, versus a corresponding figure of only about 20 per cent for the United States, according to Ben-Tzur. "Nobody has accurate numbers, but it's clear that the Canadian community visits Israel more than the American.

"In part, it's because the Jews in Canada are more affiliated than those in the United States. Also, in Canada the ties to Israel are more emotional; they're more business-like in the United States. In Canada, you can still talk to the emotions."

While the attachment of the Canadian Jewish community to Israel is strong, Ben-Tzur observed that relations between Diaspora Jews and the maturing Jewish state have attained a new level of parity.

"Israel is no longer the baby that has to be nourished, no longer the young state that the Diaspora has to bring up like a little kid. Israel is almost 50 years old. It's a very strong, very modern country that is doing very well economically.

"There is now a reciprocal relationship between Israel and the Diaspora. We in the Diaspora need Israel as much as Israel needs us."

Ben-Tzur's most enduring frustration has been in dealing with media outlets that apply a double standard to Israel and persistently portray the Jewish state in a negative light, she said.

"It's no secret that I wasn't satisfied with the general media coverage that Israel has received in North America and in Canada in particular. It seems that every hiccup in Israel becomes amplified and examined under an international microscope. Many things in Israel make news that would not be noticed in any other country. Because it's Israel, it gets a headline on the front page."

The peace process has improved Israel's "image problem" and has served as one of Ben-Tzur's best tools in promoting travel to Israel.

"Without the peace process, it would be very difficult to promote tourism to the region," she acknowledged.

Ruth and her husband, Eddie Ben-Tzur, an official with the United Israel Appeal, return to Jerusalem in mid-July.

"My husband, myself and my three children will always have a warm spot for Canada," she said.

"I felt at home here. I never thought that I could relate to the word 'home' as somewhere other than Jerusalem, but today I can really say that Toronto was home for me. I love the people, I love the culture, I love everything about Toronto but the weather. "

Israel's tourism ministry has designated Arie Shevy-Shibi, a ministry veteran previously posted in New York, Europe and the Far East, as Ben-Tzur's replacement. A farewell party for Ben-Tzur is slated for July 10.

Jewish student journalists gather for conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dave Gordon

TORONTO — As editor of Images, a local Jewish university student paper published five times a year, and co-editor of Dorot, a Jewish student literary magazine, Dave Gordon sometimes felt his journalistic efforts were unique.

But recently the 24-year-old York University English major attended an intensive two-day conference of the Jewish Student Press Service (JSPS) held at New York University's Bronfman Centre for Jewish Student Life.

"I thought, 'Wow! There are other people who think as I do, who work as I do, put together these publications as I do," said Gordon. "It was such a learning experience."

There are some 40 Jewish student publications in the United States, according to a JSPS news release. Canada has fewer than half a dozen, to the best of Gordon's knowledge.

The purpose of the conference, according to the release, was to expose students to current Jewish media issues, help improve their technical skills and make them aware of the scope of the professional field.

JSPS functions as a network for Jewish student journalists as well as a source of articles, in the same way as a newswire service.

Gordon and Bram Aaron, a journalism student at Algonquin College in Ottawa, were the only Canadians among the 30 participants. Both received partial funding from their respective Jewish student organizations.

Aaron, 24, who is from Toronto, has several years' experience writing for Carleton University's student paper, the Charlatan. In fact, he enjoyed it so much he decided to pursue journalism as a career.

Although his main interest is sports writing, Aaron has written on Jewish subjects and said he would be happy to work in the Jewish media, a field about which he knew relatively little before the conference.

For Gordon, the Jewish student press represents an important conduit for opinion and a way of giving back to the community.

Speakers at the conference represented a "who's who of Jewish publications and editors," said Gordon. Among them were Winnipeg native Susan Weidman Schneider, editor-in-chief of Lilith magazine; Debra Nussbaum Cohen, Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA) staff writer; Leonard Fein, author and founder of Moment magazine; Blu Greenberg, feminist thinker and writer; Lisa Hostein, JTA editor; Letty Cottin Pogrebin, a founder of Ms. magazine; and Gary Rosenblatt, editor and publisher of the New York Jewish Week.

Issues addressed included investigative reporting, editing techniques – where to draw the line; and what constitutes Jewish content (both Canadians found the example of Jewish Olympic gymnast Kerri Strug particularly interesting). Most participants agreed, said Gordon, that just because someone is Jewish is not reason enough to do a story on them.

A session on Israel and the American Media reinforced Aaron's belief that Jewish students must be vigilant about monitoring how Israel is portrayed in the general media. Having responded in print to a "very anti-Israel article" in the general student press, Aaron recommends that students at least point out bias to others who will respond, if they are not inclined to do so themselves.

Bram Aaron

To his surprise, Aaron found a panel on Jewish Women and the Media worth attending. "I thought at first, 'What relevance does this have for me as a male?' I realized that, even as men, we need to be aware of these sorts of issues." Referring to his conference notes, Aaron noted the importance of maintaining balance within a story and doing justice to both men and women.

"I brought back nuggets of information – little gems – from every speaker," said Gordon.

Equally enlightening was the interaction with his American counterparts. Even those with a large Jewish student population to draw on were "a little envious" of the high number of editorial contributors (three dozen) to Images' most recent issue, Gordon said.

"A lot of conference-goers confessed they had to force friends to help out. I've been guilty of that myself."

Gordon returned from the conference full of ideas for the next issue of Images. "It was so intense that I came back physically exhausted but mentally energized."

JIAS holds national meeting in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Canada's national meeting here this year marked two milestones.

It was the first time the organization has held a national meeting outside Toronto or Montreal and it was the first major function at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

As JIAS celebrates its 75th anniversary, it looks back on a year of major change both in its personnel and focus. Following opening remarks by Larry Hurtig, president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, JIAS Canada president Adrian Albert of Edmonton presented a report on the year's events.

While helping new Jewish immigrants to Canada remains the organization's raison d'etre, JIAS leaders have concluded it is equally important to raise the agency's profile through education and to work more closely with Jewish family and child services in centres outside Toronto and Montreal to help Jewish newcomers become better integrated.

"While Montreal and Winnipeg have developed outreach programs to encourage more Jewish immigration from the former Soviet Union and Argentina, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton are more concerned with integration and educating their communities on the benefits of immigration considering the negative reports in the general press," Albert said.

"Calgary and Edmonton are also concerned about having the financial resources to look after the needs of newcomers to the community."

Albert reviewed some of the events that have been held in Toronto and Montreal to celebrate JIAS's 75th anniversary, as well as some of the steps being taken or considered to raise the agency's profile.

"We are in the process of reactivating our public relations committee and we are working on a national brochure," he said. "We are looking for funding to allow us to put out our national newsletter more often. We have launched a national poster contest to mark our 75th anniversary. Unfortunately, our MAP project [the distribution of maps to Jewish schools outlining the different streams of Jewish immigration to Canada] is in limbo until we can find more grant money."

Barry Silverman and Sandy Atlin presented reports on JIAS activities in Montreal and Toronto respectively while Ian Fine of Nepean, Ont., gave a brief regional report.

In his report, new JIAS Canada executive director Michael Briks expressed anger at the recent decision by the Council of Jewish Federations (Canada) to cut the JIAS budget by $20,000.

"The council's decision to cut a relatively bare bones budget by six percent sends a warning signal and is a challenge to all levels of JIAS operations to do considerably more in an effective and efficient manner with considerably less," he said.

As a result, he noted, the national office will be staffed by part-timers and communications across the country will be shifted from the telephone to e-mail and other forms of higher tech communications.

JIAS relief and integration funds, and administrative funding for services provided by partners across the country, will remain intact.

In the meantime, the national office is looking to grants and other funding sources to make up part of the shortfall.

Briks reported that JIAS has been working with Jewish communities in Winnipeg, Windsor and Halifax to promote immigration, settlement and integration. The agency also took part in the 1997 JIAS Montreal 100 Family Mission to the former Soviet Union.

"Jewish immigration to Canada has not ended nor will it end in the foreseeable future," Briks said. "Anti-Semitism is on the rise in many corners of the world. It's up to all us to spread the word of JIAS."

Emily Shane, executive director of Winnipeg's Jewish Child & Family Service, gave a presentation on the experience of this city's new and growing Argentinian Jewish community.

Eight families have moved to Winnipeg from Buenos Aires in the past few months. Shane notes that they come not as refugees but as immigrants seeking to better their lives.

Therefore, they come with a positive attitude to the Jewish community here. They are westernized, speak English reasonably well and are economically independent. Some have already bought homes after less than a year.

"We hoped that there would be more professionals among our new community members from Argentina," Shane said. "Most who have come, however, have been professionals. Some are finding that their expectations are not being met. It is a challenge that we hope to resolve quickly. Overall though, over 50 percent are now employed."

Some of Winnipeg's other recent Jewish immigrants and refugees – those from the former Soviet Union and Bosnia – were also recognized with JIAS Canada scholarships. The John Hirsch Awards for the Performing Arts were awarded to talented young adult pianists Victoria Gomon, originally from central Asia, Evgenia Kirjner from Perm and Tatiana Roitman from Ukraine. Gomon is currently attending UBC while Roitman and Kirjner are at McGill.

The Michael and Marta Herling Award was given to Igor Tolstikov, from Uzbekistan, who is entering a Masters Program in Computer Science at the University of Waterloo.

General scholarships went to Slavic Djunc-Ciganovic, from Sarajevo, who is studying for a BSc in biology at the University of Winnipeg; Bella Imodina from Russia who hopes to pursue a career in medicine; and Dunja Malenica from Bosnia who is looking to a career in pharmacy.

Author shows Holocaust through children's eyes

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — It's not often a speaker can keep more than 50 elementary school children quiet and attentive for almost an hour, unless of course it's their teacher giving out information for an upcoming test.

But Carol Matas needed no desk or blackboard to hold the children's attention. The author had a silent house as she read from her work to the Vancouver Talmud Torah students at the Isaac Waldman Jewish Public Library May 26. Many students were keeping their excitement in quiet check, anticipating a chance to get their books signed.

"She talks about issues that we think about and want to know about," said Jessica Stoller, 12, explaining the author's success with her readership.

Those issues are not your everyday topics of kids growing up in North American homes trying to figure out who to ask to school dance. The stories cover some of the most horrific periods and subjects of modern history.

Her series Lisa, Jesper, and Daniel's Story, for which she is well known, are novels about young teenagers experiencing the Holocaust. But she has also written It's Up to Us about nuclear war, The Burning Time about witch hunts in 16th-century France, and Sworn Enemies about two Jewish children in Czarist Russia.

"Writing for the age that I write for seems to come naturally for me," said the 47-year-old Winnipeg writer. "It's not even a conscious thing. All I think about when I'm telling a story is how to tell it in the best way possible, not how to tell it in the best way possible for that age."

The best way possible means including some sticky moral issues in her work, for which she has been praised. Issues such as how far one person should go to survive or what happens when a rabbi becomes too friendly with teenagers.

"Sometimes that kind of honesty is troubling for children's book people," she admits. "They want everything to be very uplifting and very nice. If I get in trouble with reviewers it's because it's very difficult for people to handle that."

Matas' work recognized

Despite such observations, Matas' work is not without recognition in the literary world. The Burning Time was short-listed for a Governor General's award in 1994. After the War, which might be called the fourth in the series of Holocaust novels, won, among numerous other nominations, a 1997 Canadian Jewish Book Award for young adult fiction and the American Library Association best book of the year for young adults.

Though some of her adult readers may find the topics of her books tough to deal with, such is not the case with the audience for which they were written.

"They're easy to follow along," said Adam Braverman, 13. "I like the kind of style that she has. A lot of her characters are a year or two older that we are, but they have the same kind of attitude towards what we care about in those situations."

Jews must make peace with each other: PM

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Before Israel can make peace with its Arab neighbors, the Jewish people must make peace with one another.

That was the message Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu conveyed Sunday to the Jewish Agency for Israel Assembly.

"For there to be peace between Jews and Arabs, between Israelis and Palestinians, first there must be peace at home," said Netanyahu, referring to the growing rift between religious and secular Jews in Israel and the Diaspora.

"The key is to have peace among the Jews. We must have unity to meet our goals."

While stressing that Israelis must learn to be more tolerant of Jews abroad, the prime minister rejected the notion of American-style pluralism as a model for Israeli society.

Unlike the United States, which long ago defined the boundaries between religion and state, the religion-state relationship in Israel is still evolving, Netanyahu said.

He told more than 500 delegates on the assembly's final day, that Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion concluded nearly 50 years ago that "there is no way to resolve the disagreements between the halachic view of running the Jewish state and the secular view."

For this reason, Netanyahu said, the country has developed "a series of ad hoc compromises which Ben-Gurion called the status quo.

"We have communities that are becoming increasingly secular, and others that are becoming increasingly religious over time."

To accommodate both lifestyles, "there are certain compromises we make to keep this society intact," Netanyahu said.

"Religious communities are closed on Shabbat, while the secular communities are open. Some Israelis go to the army, some go to yeshivot."

In his address, Netanyahu appeared to scold Reform and Conservative Jewish leaders for disturbing what he called "the slowly evolving status quo."

In an apparent reference to Diaspora efforts to block legislation that would cement in law Orthodox authority over conversions, Netanyahu said, "there was an attempt to deliver a hammer blow."

While he acknowledged that the conversion bill was introduced by Orthodox Knesset members without input from Diaspora Jews, Netanyahu said Diaspora Jews often do not consult Israelis on religious matters.

"When it comes to patrilineal descent, no one consulted Israel," said Netanyahu, referring to the Reform movement's decision to regard as Jewish any child born of a Jewish father.

"If you don't want unilateral actions, let's avoid hammer blows."

Legislative work on the conversion bill was suspended last week after non-Orthodox leaders negotiated an accord with the government, establishing a committee to find a compromise this summer on the divisive issue.

"I urge people to tread very lightly on this very fragile ground," Netanyahu said. "I urge greater tolerance toward one another."

Change, he added, "must be incremental."

In contrast to pluralism, there was consensus in the hall when Netanyahu called for 50,000 young Jews to visit Israel every year.

"That's five times the amount who normally come," he said.

"We must make great efforts to bring youngsters here. There is nothing like walking the streets of Jerusalem, touching the [Western] Wall, to connect them to their roots."

While he applauded the prime minister's goal to bring more young Jews to Israel, Alan Feldbaum, a delegate from South Bend, Ind., had another idea.

Referring to the three-day fact-finding trip he and other delegates had taken last week to the former Soviet Union, Feldbaum proposed a Peace Corps-type program that would bring together Israeli and Diaspora teens.

"I'd like to take Jewish kids from the United States and their Israeli counterparts and send them to places like Nikolaev, a little town in Odessa that we visited. They could be partners, teaching other young people. Then we would really have something."

"The opportunity is there," Feldbaum said, "if we put the resources behind it."

Additional compensation offered

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

FRANKFURT — Thousands of Jewish Holocaust survivors could be eligible for additional compensation from Germany.

Under a recently negotiated agreement, qualified survivors could receive about $290 a month.

The accord reached between the German government and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany eases the criteria for receiving such assistance.

Those who previously received up to $20,230 in compensation from the German government can file a claim to obtain the additional payments.

Monthly payments were previously restricted to survivors who had received less than $5,780 in German compensation.

The money comes from a special hardship fund for Holocaust victims set up in the 1990 German unification treaty. The criteria for the monthly payments have often been criticized by both German and Jewish groups.

To qualify for the $290 monthly payment, survivors must prove that they spent at least six months in a concentration camp or at least 18 months in a ghetto or in hiding in Germany or Eastern Europe.

Children who were separated from their parents can file claims if they lived under a false identity for at least 18 months.

Those who lived in a Western European country at the time of persecution are not eligible because Germany paid reparations to those countries after the war.

Meanwhile, representatives of the Claims Conference and the American Jewish Committee continue to discuss the issue of compensation for Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe with senior German government officials, but no solution is in sight.

In May, the American Jewish Committee ran an advertisement in the New York Times to call attention to the problem.

Russian Jewish community adjusting to new freedoms

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

MOSCOW — In the dingy and cramped courtyard of Moscow's Choral Synagogue, recent arrivals to the Jewish community have revived an ancient ritual. Jews from Chechnya and Georgia gather occasionally to slaughter sheep to provide themselves with kosher meat.

Second of a four-part series

Ten years ago, such an activity might have landed the perpetrators before a Soviet court. But in today's Russia, it's an indication that the practice of Judaism is reviving.

Ever since the Soviet Union collapsed and a form of rough and ready democracy took its place, the Jewish community and other minority groups have experienced a rebirth of community life. The Jewish community has seen the spontaneous creation of dozens of local organizations, as well as of an umbrella group, the Federation of Jewish Organizations, more commonly known as the Vaad.

For Michael Chlenov, president of the Vaad, planning for the welfare of the Jewish community is a greater priority than preparing them for life elsewhere. Since 1989, when there were no independent Jewish organizations, hundreds have been created across Russia and 300 have joined the Vaad.

Synagogues have been revitalized and new ones opened; several Jewish schools have been launched; kosher food has become available, though it remains expensive and hard to find; Jewish groups from abroad, including the Jewish Agency, the Joint Distribution Committee and an Israeli government liaison office, have established their presence; a Jewish theatre has experienced a burst of new life; and several Jews have risen to the highest levels of the Russian government.

The exodus of Russian Jews that so captured the imagination of the Diaspora in the early '90s has diminished, with emigration from larger ex-Soviet cities petering out. Jews from small towns and from the poorer republics in the south continue to make aliyah.

Close to one million Jews remain in Russia and another 600,000 to 700,000 in Ukraine. The city of Moscow alone is home to an estimated 250,000 to 300,000 Jews and St. Petersburg has a similar number. According to Chlenov, some sort of Jewish organizational life exists in 100 cities.

Chlenov, who also serves on the executive of the World Jewish Congress and as president of the Euro-Asian Jewish Congress, said those estimates are not based on halachic definition of Jewishness, but on Israel's Law of Return.

"We have a very specific type of identity. It's predominantly ethnic. The role of religion as a cementing power was very low under 70 years of communism," he said. For many urban-dwelling Russian Jews, identity was linked to the perception they are members of the country's intellectual elite, he added.

Elite or not, the Russian Jewish community faces enormous challenges, not the least of which is caring for an increasingly elderly and impoverished population. Seniors account for half the Jewish population and many live in dire economic circumstances, Chlenov said.

While the Vaad is Russia's largest umbrella organization, it is not the richest, said Vaad vice-president Roman Spector.

In fact, "the Vaad is a union of so-called poor people," he said.

Some of Russia's wealthier Jews, including bankers and industrial magnates, have established the Russian Jewish Congress, which finances its own projects. The Congress does not assist the Vaad in any of its programs.

Relations between the two organizations are proper and a new group has been formed to serve as a venue for discussing coordinated activities, Spector said.

Figures show that in recent years, Russian Jews increasingly are staying put — at least in the larger cities. Chlenov predicts a 30 percent drop in 1997 emigration compared to 1996 when 16,000 Jews left Russia. Only 1,000 of them were from Moscow. The majority of emigres originated in "the provinces" where Jews experience a lower standard of living than in the cities, he said.

Anti-Semitism is not proving a major factor in emigration, he continued. It is no longer state policy though "there is quite dangerous social and political anti-Semitism manifested by non-governmental organizations and among political opportunists," he said.

An indicator of the new openness of the Russian political system is the success of several Jewish or partly Jewish politicians who have vaulted to near the top of the Russian government. First Deputy Premier Boris Nemtsov, one of the country's most popular politicians, is Jewish and the other First Deputy Premier, Anatoly Chubais, is reputedly half-Jewish. Economics Minister Yakov Urenson is Jewish.

One indication that Russian Jews have experienced a sea change in local attitudes in recent years is the flourishing of Jewish education, from kindergarten and elementary school through to university programs.

The Moscow National Jewish School, a state-supported institution, is one of three Jewish day schools in Moscow. Established in October 1991, the school educates 250 students from grades one through 11. The building is bright and cheery and its walls are decorated with children's artwork as well as paintings provided by the Association of Jewish Artists of Moscow. The school has a kosher canteen supervised by a mashgiach.

Natalia Doukhon, a Grade 8 teacher, said the school has proven to be a runaway success, with its graduates generally excelling academically. The children receive instruction from two to four hours a day in Jewish studies.

She described the school as "liberal" with no mandate to push religious belief. Instead, it teaches about religious customs, Jewish history, the Hebrew language and Zionism, she said.

The school serves a dual purpose of educating parents as well as children, Doukhon said. People in their 30s and 40 are "a lost generation" who know very little about Jewish culture. Parents come to the school to share in holiday celebrations with their children and learn about Judaism from their kids, she added.

After high school, students have the opportunity of enrolling in Moscow State University or the Russian State Humanitarian University, where programs in Jewish culture, history, Yiddish, Hebrew and other Judaic subjects are offered, Spector said. About 450 students are currently enrolled in Jewish programs in those institutions, he said, adding there are six yeshivot now operating in Moscow.

* * *

As mashgiach at the National School, Zev Emmanuel is responsible for overseeing the kashrut of food served there. Appointed by Rabbi Moshe Goldberg, rosh yeshivah in Moscow for Chabad Lubavitch, Emmanuel said "it's getting easier to get kosher food, but it's very expensive."

Moscow is now served by two shoichetim (kosher slaughterers) but kosher food is available in only a few locations. Chabad Lubavitch is planning to open a large kosher food store, he said.

So far, Georgian Jews, Israelis living in Moscow and the families of children at the Jewish schools are the main customers. People living outside Moscow and St. Petersburg have little access to kosher food, Emmanuel said.

Emmanuel came to religious life late in life. A former member of the Spetnaz, the Russian Green Berets, he served in Afghanistan for two years. During that time, he had the opportunity to observe Passover and eat matzah when a member of his unit travelled to Tashkent to get the unleavened bread.

An expert in karate and other self-defence disciplines, Emmanu-el said his journey back to Judaism "is hard to explain. But a Jew always searches in different churches and confessions for God. But no where does he find God except in Judaism."

Israel & the Jewish World

The Week in Israel

June 23

• Israel and Poland inked a free-trade agreement scheduled to take effect in January 1998. The agreement covers all industrial exports and some agricultural exports.

• Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat said his security forces last week detained a woman who was planning to carry out a suicide bombing in Israel. Arafat has been blamed for not doing enough to prevent militant Islamic groups from carrying out attacks in the Jewish state.

June 24

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu asked for a meeting with Arafat in an attempt to revive the stalled peace negotiations. Reports indicate that Arafat responded by asking Netanyahu to implement the current peace agreements.

June 25

June 26

• Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy met with Netanyahu in an effort to improve their relationship. The two men have been at odds in recent days over the possible accession of Ariel Sharon to the post of finance minister.

• The Knesset passed preliminary reading of a bill that would prevent Israel's president from pardoning a criminal convicted of killing a prime minister or judge. The initiative was prompted by the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

• A senior Palestinian official criticized the Knesset's approval of a proposal to annex Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The official called the move "the beginning of annexation and expansion at the expense of all the Palestinian lands."

June 27

• Fierce clashes between IDF troops and Palestinians broke out once again in Hebron after almost a week of tense calm in the city.

Israel's final borders

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Although Israel's peace talks with the Palestine Authority are at a complete standstill and permanent status negotiations are thus far off on the horizon, speculation concerning Israel's final borders abounds.

Last month, just days after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu denied reports that maps published in Israeli newspapers reflected his ideas of Israel's future boundaries, he presented the cabinet with a strikingly similar proposal.

Calling it the Allon-Plus plan, Netanyahu recommended that Israel should retain the Jordan Valley, the Gush Etzion bloc of settlements, the greater Jerusalem area and a security belt west of the old Green Line.

Under this scheme, which leaves the fate of the Gaza Strip in abeyance, Israel would annex at least 50 percent of the West Bank and virtually all the Jewish settlements there.

Despite Netanyahu's denials, the maps of Israel's final borders, which appeared in Yediot Aharonot and Ha'aretz, bore a resemblance to his own thinking. Yediot reported that Israel would keep 40 percent of Judea and Samaria, while Ha'retz claimed that the figure was closer to 60 percent.

Averaged out, these claims amount to about 50 percent of the West Bank — a significant enlargement of the original Allon plan, which is named after the late Yigal Allon.

A commander of the pre-state Palmach, as well as a deputy prime minister and a foreign minister in successive Labor party governments, Allon unveiled his plan shortly after the Six Day War.

Allon, a security hawk, wanted to hold on to one-third of the West Bank: a corridor along the Jordan Valley, the Hebron hills west of the Dead Sea, the Latrun salient, Gush Etzion and much of East Jerusalem.

For the most part, the land coveted by Allon was either uninhabited or sparsely populated by Palestinian Arabs. In accordance with Labor party strategy, Allon had no desire to occupy areas with a strong concentration of Palestinians.

Allon's policy guided the Israeli government for a decade, until the accession to power of the Likud's Menachem Begin. Influenced by the messianism of his religious coalition partners and the secular nationalism of the World Zionist Organization's settlement department, Begin expanded the scope of the Allon plan, launching an ambitious and costly campaign to build settlements in densely populated Palestinian sectors.

As a result of this ideologically-driven effort, the purpose of which was to maintain control of the West Bank, the number of settlements there increased by leaps and bounds.

Netanyahu, given his Revisionist beliefs and the composition of his government, is personally attracted to this vision. But in keeping with the provisions of the Oslo accords, he is prepared to partition the West Bank and grant the Palestinians some form of autonomy in non-contiguous islands of territory separated from each other by a network of Jewish settlements and roads.

A departure from Greater Israel doctrine, the plan owes its inspiration to The Third Way, the relatively centrist party in Netanyahu's coalition, and Ariel Sharon, the minister of national infrastructure.

In several respects, Netanyahu's conception of Israel's final borders is somewhat like the unofficial pact signed by Yossi Beilin of the Labor party and Michael Eitan of the Likud last year. They agreed that Israel should not return to the pre-1967 lines, that the majority of settlements should be under Israeli sovereignty and that Jerusalem —Israel's capital — should remain undivided. For the record, this document of national consensus was neither endorsed by Netanyahu nor accepted by the Palestine Authority.

The Palestinians, who now exercise varying degrees of control over 27 percent of the West Bank, fully expect Israel to relinquish at least 90 percent of the West Bank and Gaza, or 23 percent of Mandatory Palestine. And therein lies an awesome impasse, one that neither American nor Egyptian diplomacy has succeeded in breaching.

PM-Levy row delays cabinet reshuffle

By JAY BUSHINSKY and MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will likely have to delay the announcement of his new cabinet appointments. The prime minister had originally intended to introduce his new appointees this week.

The delay is a result of the ministerial flap over Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon's secret meeting last week with Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), deputy head of the Palestinian Authority. One of Netanyahu's senior aides predicted a delay of at least 24 hours.

Foreign Minister David Levy, was deeply offended by not having been informed of the Sharon-Abbas rendezvous. He cancelled a scheduled meeting with Netanyahu at which the two men had been expected to patch up their most recent differences.

Levy called off the meeting, which would have been his third in the past four days with Netanyahu, last weekend, only half-an-hour before it was to have taken place. Levy also stated openly for the first time Sunday that he objected to Sharon's joining the "kitchen" cabinet — currently comprising the prime minister, foreign minister, and defence minister.

Netanyahu sent out reconciliatory messages, saying he had full confidence in Levy, and intends to discuss with him the next moves in the talks with the Palestinians at the first opportunity he gets. Israel Radio reported that the foreign minister left Jerusalem to attend a family event in the North. It did not elaborate. Sources close to Levy said he has lost all confidence in the prime minister and is considering resigning.

The Prime Minister's Office Director-General Avigdor Lieberman and Levy's assistant Ya'acov Bardugo met Sunday night in an effort to mend the rift between the two.

As Levy and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai bristled over their not having been notified of Sharon's talks with Abbas on his private farm June 16, other sources revealed that Mordechai participated in a clandestine meeting last week with Nabil Shaath, the PA's planning minister. The Defence

Ministry's spokesperson refused to comment on the report.

Sources close to Netanyahu said the Sharon-Abbas meeting was kept secret at the request of the PA.

"There was no reason to tell anyone about it," an official said, "because nothing substantive came of it."

Abbas was surprised by the "leak" of his meeting with Sharon to the media. At the time of the broadcast on Channel 1, he was having dinner in the Ra'anana home of Nimrod Novik, ex-adviser to former prime minister Shimon Peres. Also present were PA counter-intelligence head Mahmoud Dahlan, Peres, and MKs Yossi Beilin, Ephraim Sneh, and Haim Ramon.

Netanyahu conferred with Sharon for more than two hours Sunday, their conversation presumably touching on the fallout from the Abbas talks and Sharon's projected appointment as finance minister in place of Dan Meridor, who resigned June 18.

Israelis rally for Netanyahu to resign, call new elections

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli protesters took to the streets of Tel Aviv last week in separate rallies calling for an end to the Netanyahu government and to Orthodox influence.

Some 50,000 Israelis called on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to step down and they called for early elections during a rally last Saturday night at Rabin Square in central Tel Aviv.

The demonstration came after a week of growing crisis within the coalition. While the government defeated a no-confidence motion in the Knesset, several coalition members, including Foreign Minister David Levy, stayed away from the vote to protest Netanyahu's manner of running the country.

Commentators said that growing strains within coalition ranks could increase the chances of early elections.

The event was organized by a grassroots organization formed in response to the Bar-On affair.

At another rally in Tel Aviv, several thousand Israelis protested what they maintained are attempts at religious coercion by haredi Jews.

One of the slogans for the demonstration, "Stop the Haredim," drew sharp criticism from both religious and political circles, who maintained that it was racist and intolerant.

The rally came against the backdrop of the political strength the religious parties gained in the last elections and the resulting policy. Three religious parties, which hold 23 seats in the Knesset, are part of Netanyahu's coalition.

Religious coalition members have been trying to push through legislation that would set into law the Orthodox establishment's sole authority over conversions conducted in Israel.

An interdenominational committee formed as a result of negotiations between non-Orthodox U.S. Jewish leaders and the government is trying to work out a compromise on the conversion legislation by mid-August.

IDF, Jordanian army hold joint exercises at Naharayim

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The IDF and the Jordanian Armed Forces have conducted a joint military exercise in evacuating casualties from the Naharayim enclave, paving the way for the site to be reopened after being placed off limits following the March 13 massacre of seven school girls by a Jordanian soldier.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai ordered the IDF to arrange the exercise a few weeks ago and its implementation Sunday came during the visit to Israel of the Jordanian deputy chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Mohammed Salameh Hiwan.

Hiwan briefed Mordechai on the exercise during a visit to the defence ministry in Tel Aviv afterwards. Mordechai also received a running account of the event from the IDF, the defence ministry added. The meeting was attended by senior Jordanian officers as well as IDF Deputy Chief of General Staff Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilnai, Ilan Biran, director-general of the Defence Ministry, and David Ivry, special adviser to Mordechai.

Defence Ministry officials said both sides expressed satisfaction with the defence and military relations between the two countries. The open cooperation between the IDF and Jordanian army comes in contrast to the cold relations between Israel and Egypt, and the limited security coordination between the IDF and the Palestinian Authority.

Despite the March massacre, military relations between Israel and the Hashemite kingdom have remained warm and are constantly growing. Since the 1994 peace treaty between the two countries, Israel has become a staunch supporter of Jordan's military, and was key in obtaining U.S. weapons and debt reduction for Jordan.

Security relations between the two countries have grown so close that senior officers from both sides have been invited to observe the other's military exercises. Israel has provided Jordan with mine-clearing equipment. There are also the beginnings of cooperation in the area of defence trade.

Mordechai asked Hiwan for Jordan's help in locating the remains of two IDF servicemen who went missing in the 1968 battle at Karameh, and of intelligence agent Ya'akov Bukai, who was executed by the Jordanians in 1949.

Scarce medical resources trouble professionals

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — New medical and biomedical technologies, government cutbacks and increasing need vie with ethical and religious considerations when decisions are made about the allocation of scarce resources, a workshop on Ethical Issues in Allocating Resources was told.

The conclusion of the nurses, doctors and social workers present seemed to be that there is no definitive way to make those decisions. And that the situation caused them agony.

The workshop was part of an all-day symposium on Controversies in Medical Ethics: Jewish and Secular Perspectives, sponsored by the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, through the Fay Florence Grobin Memorial Fund.

Moderators Rabbi Nachum Berlat, director of pastoral care at Baycrest, and Dr. Shelley Sternberg, assistant professor of medicine at the University of Toronto, and a scientist in the clinical evaluation and epidemiology unit of Baycrest, described some of the considerations that go into making crucial decisions.

"Our synagogue holds 105 people," Rabbi Berlat said. "There are 921 residents. Do we deny access to those who might not benefit [from the religious experience?] or to those who are disruptive? And how do we provide for those who are quarantined for some reason?"

Other examples included a physician who wants to use an experimental drug that could shorten a hospital stay, as opposed to using penicillin, which he knows will work, but will lead to a longer stay.

"What about a code blue call (a demand for resuscitation) for a patient for whom it is unlikely to be successful, and which denies other patients care in the meantime [since staff is tied up with the code blue].

A social worker participating in the workshop brought up the question of being the only social worker caring for a 27-bed unit. "How do you chose who you will spend your time with? The person who needs you the most or the one who is the most vocal?"

This was echoed by a nurse, who noted nurses had to make the same kinds of decisions due to the constant retrenchment in nursing services.

On a broader scale, Sternberg brought up the question of whether scarce funds should be expended on AIDS or cancer, or on a skid row alcoholic as opposed to a college professor.

Discussion of a case study about which of three terminally ill patients should get access to one lifesaving machine, brought out some of the ways health professionals make decisions about ethical problems. These included which patient had the best chance of survival; pre-existing medical conditions (for example a patient with terminal cancer who is badly hurt in a car accident); one who has expressed a wish to die; the patients' value to society; age and whether or not one has dependents.

Rabbi Berlat explained that the Talmud deals with the same issues. Its solutions include helping the sickest first; treating the person who arrived first; helping a scholar before helping a king ('the principle of value to society," Rabbi Berlat noted).

Dump dieting, but reduce fat

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dump dieting — it causes anxiety. When you gain back the weight, you are more stressed, says a clinical social worker who specializes in size, weight and body image problems.

"We know that diets work — that's why we have all been on so many of them," says Lil Brown, who is in private practice in Toronto counselling individuals and families in the areas of eating disorders and dual addiction — chemical abuse or alcoholism.

"The problem is, that after the initial thrilling weight loss, we gain back all the weight, and more. And we are off in search of another quick solution, the latest magic pill or the new diet bible."

Brown, who received her Masters of Social Work degree at the University of Toronto and who has written and lectured extensively, explodes the myth of dieting and helps her clients examine their self-esteem and power of control.

She says that our society has an obsession with slenderness — thinness being the only measure of self-esteem. Rather than perpetuate this myth, Brown substitutes physiological, psychological and biological realities involved in dieting.

In her early 60s, Brown believes that age is a frame of mind. Up and jogging at 5 a.m., she is also active in a diversified fitness regimen.

"What we've done with middle age is believe this is a time for retirement but it is really a time to get fit. We usually have more time then."

Most of us want to be healthy and we want to discover what foods to eat and what not to eat. "This requires redirecting individuals in their life style and choice of activities. You are well on the way to success when you get control of your food, get control of your life and when you can walk away from food and feel you have escaped danger."

Bingeing, she says, is a way to displace your problems. "You get angry with yourself and you don't have to think about your problem. It is a way of setting yourself up to suffer. You have to look at the problem realistically, face it, and learn to cope with it and not use the bingeing as a substitute."

A major problem today, she notes, is drive-in restaurants and fast food franchises. "You can be invisible in your car in a drive-through restaurant." And today, we use more and more prepared and packaged foods.

Where we used to have cracked cereal and toast for breakfast, this has changed to a muffin, a doughnut or danish — these are much easier for the coffee shops to handle."

The bottom line, she says, is what the heart, cancer, diabetes and many other groups are advocating — we must lower our saturated fat content and increase our intake of fresh fruits, vegetables and beans.

She cautions that artificial sweeteners are dangerous. "Your body doesn't know the difference and it releases insulin. "If you have a predisposition to diabetes, you are using up your insulin to burn the sugar or artificial sweetener — and the insulin creates a need to eat more — it is a vicious circle." She reminds parents that boxed juices have a large concentration of sugar "which make children fat."

Brown, who once weighted 242 pounds and now weighs 142 pounds says, "I don't ask anyone to do anything I don't do."

STARTING EARLY AT THE COMPUTER

In Israel, children are starting to "walk" to their computers at a very early age. Here we see a five-year-old boy (left) teleshopping for kids' software and a young toddler activating a computer program for tots with the aid of a 21-key keyboard designed by Tel Aviv University student Itai Kohavi. Together with the keyboard and a simplified child-size mouse, toddlers can talk and play with cartoon characters on the screen. [Photos by Sammy Avnisan and WZPS]

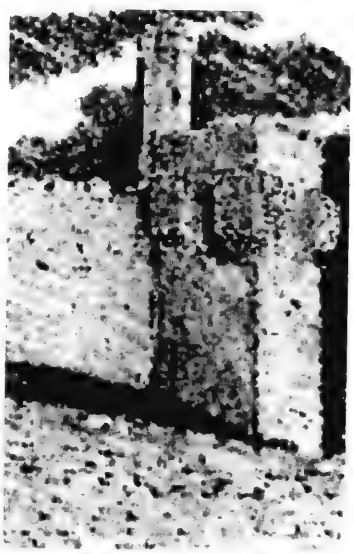
IF YOU'RE NOT FROM ISRAEL

If you're not from Israel,
you don't know a wall.
You can't know a wall!
The Western Wall still stands tall and it never falls!
With so many holes I can't believe it still stands.
In and out go the hands!
If you're not from Israel, you don't know a wall.

If you're not from Israel you don't know what used to be sandy.
You can't know what used to be sandy!
Rocks and sand their feet must have hurt.
On a hot, hot day their feet probably burnt!
They proably felt like they needed a park.
It was a wonderful place to be if no dog barked.
If you're not from Israel
You don't know what used to be sandy.

If you're not from Israel
You don't know old.
You can't know old!
Israel is 49 years old
It is just like pure gold!
From 1948 to 2048 and beyond Israel will be there.
Until then we will all do the same:



Care.
If you're not from Israel, you don't know old!

Summer the time to relax, enjoy short stories

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Now that school is over, one of the fun things to do is to find a shady spot, gather a few apples and crackers, and relax with a good book.

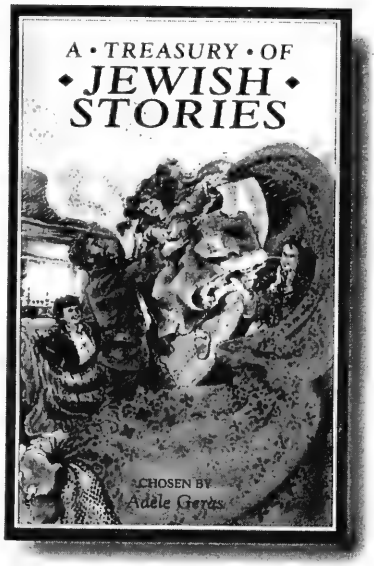
One that you will enjoy is A Treasury of Jewish Stories, chosen by Adele Geras, and illustrated by Jane Cope (Kingfisher Press, 1996).

The short stories are from different countries, such as Israel, Poland, England and South Africa. You will even find one from the silly city of Chelm, where all the inhabitants are fools.

Geras has also chosen stories from different times – 17th-century Poland, the Holocaust, the present day.

One story is set on a kibbutz in Israel, where a little girl, afraid she is getting fat, stops eating. Another is about a brother and sister who have to leave London while the Nazis are bombing the city. In one, a little girl finds out that bad temper can really hide shyness. And in another one, a rabbi and a fierce soldier find that they each have talents that the other can use.

There is enough variety that you will not become bored, but each story is short enough so that you can stop to chase butterflies or play a game with your friends.



LETS THINK OF IT AS... ZIONISM FUN!

Israeli-born singer releases video

By ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Jazz singer Liora Kigel is proving that dreams can come true, especially when they can capture the imagination of both French and English audiences.

With a first-place win in the 1996 Ontario Pop competition for singer-songwriter, and the recent addition of her album I Have Dreams to the Sam the Record Man independent artist line, the Israeli-born Canadian is ready to make her national television debut this month on the Bravo! channel with the video single Dear Reader.

"Making my first video has taught me a lot about the music industry," Kigel says. "Now that I have been through some growing pains as a performer, I have a clearer vision of the direction my career should take."

Awarded a grant by Bravo! FACT, the melancholy jazz tune Dear Reader will be shown on Bravo!Videos at 7 p.m.

"Liora has had the determination to make a name for herself in both the French and English marketplaces, which will ultimately make the major record labels take note of this talented Canadian performer," says Karen Loftus, producer of Dear Reader.

Pursuing a recording contract, Kigel has been building a following for her bilingual jazz-blues style in Toronto. Singing under the name Lowa Kay, the 28-year-old North York resident recently gave showcase performances at various Toronto clubs.

While English audiences are only now discovering her, Kigel has been regularly featured on French Canadian media, with interviews and performances on Société Radio Canada (SRC), Toronto's CBLFT-TV and tfo. Kigel is currently set to perform in Ottawa on two SRC television specials, Chez Nous '97 and Boite à Chansons, to be taped soon.

While working on her singing career, Kigel also spent last summer in Israel under the Jerusalem Fellowship Program to study heritage and traditional Jewish practices. She has also volunteered at the Aish HaTorah Learning Centre in Thornhill on several of its outreach programs.

"Exploring new areas of Judaism has given me a sense of personal spirituality that I would not have found otherwise," Kigel says. "My new appreciation of the traditions has helped me take a personal path of action and my musical career is a reflection of that."

Kigel says the album track Pearl of the World, a bitter-sweet tale of unfound love, musically reveals the influences of her Israeli background.

Courageous Jonah's Holocaust story a must-see video

BY SIMONE JOSEPH
Student Intern

TORONTO — It is heart-wrenching to watch a child exposed to the cruelty, death, starvation and irrationality of war.

In Jonah who lived in the Whale, the on-screen adaption of Jona Oberski's autobiography Childhood, 4-year-old Jonah must face the realities of war after his family is banished from their comfortable, middle-class home and sent to the barren emptiness of a concentration camp in Westerbork.

Courage is instilled in little Jonah from the beginning of the movie. The first shots feature scenes of Amsterdam in 1942 while the song Jonah in the Whale plays hauntingly in the background.

Jonah tells us that when he first heard this song on the radio, his mother sat him down and told him that if the biblical Jonah could get out of the whale, then little Jonah should think of him whenever he is afraid. At difficult times in the movie, his mother advises him to "keep your eyes on the sky and never allow yourself to hate."

Throughout the movie, we hear Jonah's young voice narrating his experiences while he grapples with the horrors of war.

Jonah in the Whale, which has played at the Montreal Film Festival and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, is loaded with stark images: children in the concentration camp leaning into large soup-kitchen pots and lapping up food like hungry dogs, men having their payot snipped off by camp guards and concentration camp prisoners secretly lighting a menorah at Chanukah while softly singing Ma'oz Tsur.

Klim Publishes Tobiasse Lithographs

Artist Theo Tobiasse was born in Israel in 1927 to parents who had just arrived from Lithuania. Confronted by insurmountable material difficulties, the family returned to Kovno when Tobiasse was still a young child, then settled in Paris.

Klim Art Publishers of Toronto, which has just published an album of six original Tobiasse lithographs, has issued a brochure in which is recorded the artist's first impression of the City of Light: "Just six years old, he saw it bathed in the greyish mist of a sad winter morning when they walked out of the Gare de l'Est after an exhausting journey that had lasted several days."

The artist spent two years of his adolescence, from July 1942 to August 1944, cooped up with his parents in their tiny apartment in the 18th arrondissement, the passage of time "punctuated by the thud of Nazi boots" in the street.

The limited edition of 199 sets of six original lithographs is entitled Songs of Light And Exile, and each piece is numbered and signed by the artist. Klim Art Publishers, 1238 Centre St., Thornhill. 905-882-0884.

In the Spotlight

Jason Schwartz, 27-year-old photographer from Toronto, has spent six years concentrating on The Ghosts That Haunt Us. That's the title of a book of his photographs of Holocaust victims, due for publication by a major publisher this fall.

An exhibition of 26 of Schwartz's photographs of Holocaust survivors just closed after running 18 months – much longer than originally intended – at Yad Vashem's Valley of the Destroyed Communities.

A collection of 58 of his photographs is scheduled for exhibition at the Koffler Gallery and subsequently the Justina Barnicke Gallery, Hart House, this fall.

"The photographs are not about the Holocaust, per se," said Schwartz. "They're about the impressions of a young person such as myself about the Holocaust, which are based entirely on media images from print and movies. Accordingly, the book I've put together is about survivors, 50 years after the fact."

A self-described "third-generational child of survivors" who went to Hebrew day school in Toronto and jumped from a business to a fine arts track at York University, Schwartz recently won a coveted Canada Arts Council grant for his next photographic project.

"I'm seeking sponsors for yet another project," he said, "a photographic study of Israeli society as Israel approaches its 50th anniversary."

ISRAEL PAINTING TOUR SET FOR LATE OCTOBER

A land of contrasts, Israel offers the painting experience of a lifetime, with a wealth of landscapes and architectural styles. The Palette of Israel: A Painting Tour of the Holy Land is set to follow the Mediterranean coast to the Galilee, then travel through the Jordan Valley to the Dead Sea.

The planned tour takes in the Roman ruins at Caesarea, the Belvoir Crusader fortress, a Bedouin village in the Judean wilderness, the mountaintop fortress of Masada, St. George's Monastery and picturesque alleyways in Old Jerusalem and other sites in places like Ein Hod, Jaffa, and Tel Aviv.

Tour instructor Margaret Roseman, an internationally acclaimed watercolorist living in Toronto, will demonstrate painting techniques; Toronto-based trip coordinator Bilha Morgan, who grew up in Israel, is also a noted artist and art instructor.

The tour runs from Oct. 26 to Nov. 9, and costs $3,499 per artist ($3,299 per non-artist) sharing a double room, with a single supplement of $625. Includes airfare, most meals, accommodations for 12 nights, entrance fees, porterage and sightseeing in private air-conditioned motorcoach with licensed guide. Special seven-day tour packages are priced from $1,997. HKTA, 416-366- 2389.

Cycling in Tuscany: A cycling tour through the cradle of the Italian Renaissance takes in the richness of Jewish history as well as the beauty of the landscape. In the Tuscan cities of Florence and Sienna, and in the medieval "border communities" of Monte San Savino, Pitigliano, Sorano and Sovana, the cyclists will meet many local representatives and stay in Renaissance villas, monasteries and castles. For those in their 20s or 30s, Vanguard's Camp Young Judaea can provide hiking, swimming, tennis, volleyball, arts and crafts, campfire singalongs and dancing by starlight, all in a scenic grove of the Hudson River Valley.

Mental challenges also await, as prizes will be awarded in Jewish history, theology and biblical studies; Rabbi David Ackerman, a Pennsylvania professor, is scholar-in-residence. Cost is US $230; round trip bus fare from New York City is $45; Aug. 22 to 24. 212-303-8061.

Young boy's holocaust story a must-see video

Watching Jonah's family transform from a close, happy, well-adjusted family to a weak, emotionally disturbed one is a sobering experience. It makes one realize how much we, in 1997, take for granted and it makes one bitterly reflect on the fact that this mass murder occurred in our own century.

Jonah in the Whale is a well-written, powerful, touching drama that should not be missed. It is available for rent in selected video stores across Canada.

Business Profile

Science a creative art for new OSC director

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As a young teenager in Montreal, Sid Katz defied pressure to focus his efforts on writing, an art at which he showed promise, to pursue his passion for science.

These days, he presides over the Ontario Science Centre (OSC), where he became director general and chief executive officer in March. Katz stepped in at a pivotal time in the 28-year-old institution's history, with provincial government funding down to a low of $11.8 million from a peak a decade ago of the $18 million needed to run the centre.

Now the OSC is relying increasingly on alternate sources of revenue such as its new OMNIMAX theatre, the centrepiece of a major revitalization project, to make up the shortfall.

He never bought into the negative stereotype. "Science plays such an important role in our lives from the moment we wake up in the morning and put on the coffee maker until we go to bed at night listening to the clock radio using, perhaps, nuclear energy. Science is very much part of our culture. It's every bit as creative and interesting as art. I love the idea of trying to find things — the pursuit of knowledge. Science was my way of expressing myself."

And express himself he did. A respected broadcaster and writer, Katz' curriculum vitae includes stints as medical science columnist on CBC Radio's Morningside, as a frequent guest on its science program Quirks and Quarks, and as a weekly science specialist on BCTV. He has written for publications such as Homemaker's and B.C. Health News.

Prior to accepting the Science Centre position, Katz was executive director of Science World in Vancouver, where he also was a professor at the University of British Columbia. With a PhD in Pharmacology from McGill University, Katz is still actively involved in medical research.

"He does get a twinkle in his eye when he speaks about the value of science education," said Debra Feldman-Pottens, director of the OSC's OMNIMAX Theatre/Reception branch. Feldman-Pottens, who has been with the Centre for 17 years, served as acting CEO for almost nine months preceding Katz' arrival, but did not apply for the top position herself.

"The transition, I think, has been very smooth," she said. "We were all very pleased."

Like the OSC, Science World in Vancouver is a hands-on science museum with a large-screen theatre. So why would Katz want to leave Vancouver's temperate climate, ocean and mountains for a more-or-less equivalent job?

"I certainly didn't do it for the money or my own c.v.," he said. Science World is "not in the centre of the universe. This has got to be the best possible venue to show the importance of informal education, in this case informal science education."

Despite considerable provincial funding cuts, Katz praised Ontario's "better tradition of government support." Unlike the Science Centre, which was built as a project for Canada's centennial, Science World receives no government funding and is almost totally self-sufficient, earning 92 cents of every dollar it spends, he said.

At Science World, Katz created programs and exhibits with the intent of forging partnerships with industry and government. "That's essentially what I'm trying to do here. I can use the same tools I used at Science World. The idea is that nothing any more happens without solid partnerships. We have to integrate ourselves into these different communities to ensure that we survive and do well."

The OMNIMAX theatre, which bears the name of Shoppers' Drug Mart, is a case in point. The $15-million theatre has a long list of corporate sponsors; the Ontario government provided half the funding.

One of only three such theatres in Canada (the other two are at Science World and the Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec), the OMNIMAX — where shows like Special Effects, about visual trickery in Hollywood movies, are shown on an oversized concave screen — is living up to expectations.

Since it opened in December, over 250,000 people — more than half the visitors to the Science Centre over that time — have experienced the dizzying sensation of being right in the movie, enhanced by 13,000 watts of wraparound digital sound.

Unlike the oversize flat screen at Ontario Place's IMAX theatre, the OMNIMAX screen hugs the interior of a dome, extending back just over the heads of audience members.

In 1996, 850,000 people visited the Science Centre. Katz expects that number to increase to one million this year.

The addition of large-screen theatres at other institutions has translated into increased profits, said Feldman-Pottens, who oversaw the OMNIMAX project from its inception four years ago. She has good reason to believe the Science Centre will follow suit.

Already she has noted "a real increase in the seniors' market," particularly at the mid-afternoon shows. The three mid-day shows have been sellouts on weekdays when school is open. To complement the movies, the OSC has been developing related programs for school groups.

For seniors — and others — the location of the theatre at the front of the building is particularly appealing, said Feldman-Pottens. "They don't have to do a lot of walking."

The addition of an in-centre bistro has boosted the appeal of the theatre as an evening destination, she added, noting that the theatre can also be rented for private use. "It diversifies our revenue stream.

"We thought it's such a perfect fit," she said. "We thought the theatre would be one way to bring people back, but not the only way. If it's not a strong and healthy science centre, it will not survive."

Changing the film (there have been two so far) is a strong way of getting people back to the OSC more frequently, she pointed out.

Declining attendance figures in recent years were due in part to poor accessibility for strollers and wheelchairs and a perception that the centre was geared only to young children, said Feldman-Pottens. "We've made a conscious decision to develop content geared to older children as well."

Making the OSC "relevant and popular" is Katz' top priority. It's another way to increase revenues, he believes. "Be exciting and relevant and you get more people to come."

One way is to make teachers more aware of the excitement of teaching science, he said. Another is to raise awareness of career opportunities in science. "Science has to be one of the most important areas for careers in this country."

While most OSC-goers are from the Toronto area and nearby, the centre has several international links, and Katz is looking to strengthen them. A cooperative venture with the Bloomfield Science Centre in Jerusalem is under discussion. "They are coming to visit and we would be interested in collaborating with them," said Katz.

Currently an OSC exhibit called Science Circus is on display at a museum in Thailand, and the centre has done "quite a bit" in the Arab Emirates. Travelling exhibits, which have been done in the past and of which more are projected, provide revenue for the Centre.

Katz' favorite on-site exhibit, a new one called A Question of Truth, addresses cultural issues related to science. "I think that's really important. It shows that not any one culture has the corner on scientific knowledge. It's important to be searching all the time for what truth is."

"Don't give [students] facts," Katz said. "Facts will be wrong in a few years. Teach them about the process. It's more difficult but much more interesting."

Weightlifter finds passion in art

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

ARTS

TORONTO — The artist, someone once wrote, does not see things as they are, but as he is.

That explains why Joel Strauss' paintings come across as powerful, explosive and pulsating with vigor. At the same time, there's a kind of balance and harmony about them.

Strauss, an intense, stout 31-year-old, is a former weightlifter for Canada and Israel who would routinely hoist 300 pounds over his head. Now, he uses a paintbrush to attack a canvas the way a lifter approaches his weights.

Strauss' work reflects a sport that combines brute strength with grace and timing. His color-splashed, pinpoint acrylics throb with vitality and even aggression, but they also have surprisingly fine, delicate qualities.

He calls his physical prowess and artistic temperament a perfect marriage. Or as Strauss puts it, he's "a strong artist."

Painting is a new-found avocation. Strauss is a full-time shiatsu therapist at geriatric centres around Metro. But weightlifting was his first love.

He began the much misunderstood sport at Toronto's Jewish Community Centre in 1978, after learning about it from his father, Maurice, who had competed for Belgium and Canada. Joel made Canada's national team in 1985, competed in that year's junior world championships, and went on to compete at the 1985 Maccabiah Games, placing second in the 90-kg class.

Disillusioned by Canadian lifters' use of steroids, and taken with Israel, Strauss made aliyah in 1987. Lifting for a Tel Aviv club, he broke a 15-year-old record that had belonged to David Berger, the Israeli lifter murdered in the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre. Strauss qualified to compete for Canada at the 1988 Games in Seoul, but a dislocated elbow cut short his career.

He returned to Canada in 1989 and took up what he calls "recreational lifting," which these days means toying around with 100-kg weights. His personal best was 147 kg (323 lbs.) in the snatch (a single-motion lift ended in the squat position) and 165 kg (363 lbs.) in the clean and jerk, the two-stage lift in which the weight is hoisted to the chest and then powered overhead.

Strauss calls the sport "controlled violence." It obviously requires raw power. But lifters also employ nuance and subtlety to get the weights aloft.

He turned to painting to replace the drama and passion he misses, and found the progression natural. He describes his art as "contained rage."

Joel Strauss: Art is 'contained rage'

"I've been blessed with an outlet," Strauss told The CJN. "Painting has allowed me to bring the qualities of lifting and art together in a kind of spiritual dance. I want to take superhuman strength and achieve something superhuman as an artist. I still want to move mountains.

"For me, it's not over. My lifting career is more relevant now than ever. This [painting] is a greater strongman act. It's allowed my passion to re-emerge."

Strauss's work has appeared in several juried shows. A selection will be part of a group show opening July 26 at James Allen Fine Arts (1596 Queen St. W.), while a solo exhibit is planned for January at the Academy of Spherical Arts (38 Hanna Ave.).

Canada gunning for gold at Maccabiah softball

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was back in December 1995 that Brian Revin fully realized what a good thing he had going.

Revin was in Buenos Aires, Argentina, with two Canadian softball teams competing in the Pan American Maccabi Games when he looked at the lineups for the championship final. He was more than a little pleased to see that, playing in a highly competitive field, the final came down to a matchup between Canada 1 and Canada 2. Needless to say, Canada won the gold medal and gave Revin, manager of both teams, a boost of confidence going into the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"I think this is our strongest team ever," Revin said recently as he considered the lineup he'll manage at the fastpitch competition in Israel. "The main reason is our depth. I wouldn't be afraid to put anyone in the field or up at the plate."

Canada is the Maccabiah Games' defending gold-medal champion thanks to a victory over their arch-rivals, the United States, in 1993. Canada finally won gold that year after consecutive silver-medal performances in the 1985 and '89 games, losing narrowly both times to the Americans.

This time around, Revin expects the United States to again be tough, with Argentina also fielding a strong team.

The Canadian squad, for its part, will feature a good blend of youth and experience. About half the team are veterans of 1993 while the rest of the team is new. Of the seven new players, four are graduates of the Maccabi junior program, which has won its share of gold medals in youth competitions.

Sixty guys in Toronto tried out last summer for the 15 places on the team and a second try-out camp was held in Montreal but in the end, the team consists solely of players from Ontario.

"In Quebec," Revin explains, "they don't seem to play fastball. The big difference is the hitting. They're fine defensively, but they can't seem to hit."

Revin also admits to having trouble identifying top Jewish players west of Ontario, but, based on his experience, "I don't think the Jewish kids are playing at a reasonable level out west."

The Canadian team will be led by quality pitchers, Mark Bendahan, David Strauss and Rick Green. Revin said. Bendahan throws for the Toronto Gators while Strauss pitches for the team from Chicken Deli that plays in a Toronto intermediate league. Bobby Green is another members of the Gators, which has competed in the world fastpitch championships.

Steven Kushnir, assistant coach and player with the '97 team, is geared up for the games. It'll be the third Maccabiah for the DH/infielder and he raves about the Maccabiah experience. "Anytime you can play a kid's game in Israel, it's great," he said.

A veteran of the '85 and '93 teams, Kushnir expects to renew friendships with Maccabiah athletes he's tussled with in the past. Not too long ago, he received a phone call from the catcher of the Mexican team who said he couldn't wait to see him again in Israel.

For Phil Gigan, who plays for Chicken Deli in Toronto, this too will be his third trip to Israel. He was on the '89 and '93 teams, he was in Argentina in '95 and in Venezuela in 1988. He believes the '97 edition is the best team yet with "a lot of good young players."

This will be David Fabian's first Maccabiah. He played on the gold medal-winning Toronto team at the 1986 junior games and was part of the championship team in Argentina. His best baseball experience came during that tournament when in the semi-finals, Canada 1 was down 2-1 to the United States with two outs in the last inning and scored two runs to win.

The nine-country round robin Maccabiah Games competition will be held on Kibbutz Gezer, a settlement founded by American Jews.

Hoops squad best yet

MONTREAL — The Canadian men's basketball team headed to Israel for the Maccabiah Games is arguably its best ever, say Maccabi Canada officials.

So the team could for the first time do better than bronze – Canada's last was in 1989 – in one of the Jewish Olympics' most competitive events.

About 16 countries usually compete in the event.

"I believe it's one of the best teams ever," said national athletic committee chair Bob Luxenberg. "We have speed, we have strength and we have height."

Five of the team members – British Columbia's Seth Adler, Floridian Isaac Kodsi, and Ontarians Nathan Aryev, Dan Becker and Alex Brainis – are vets of '93, when a tough draw combined with jet lag resulted in Canada being shut out of the medal rounds after three games.

The team will be coached by Concordia University's John Dore, who is recognized as one of the best university coaches in Canada. He'll be assisted by veteran Montreal basketball official Johnny Elias.

Luxenberg noted that Maccabiah vet Adler is probably the "top university guard in the country."

Sharing the court will be Quebecer Alex Bougaieff, who lives in Trois-Rivières and stands 6 feet 10 inches tall.

Also new to the team is Dan Birsan, a landed immigrant who has played for Romania's national team.

Rounding out the squad will be: Quebecers Andrew Bier, Joel Perlman and David Steiner; Ari Hunter, of Ontario; and, Adam Eisenstat of British Columbia.

The Inside Back

Kids' parties a real challenge

By JORDAN MAX

Around our house, the most stressful activity next to Pesach is deciding on and planning our children's birthday parties. First of all, most children have busier social calendars than their parents, so booking a date which doesn't conflict with other classmates' parties, various lessons, community events, circuses and concerts is a challenge in itself.

Secondly, the activity has to be something the guests have never done before. Gone forever are the parties I seem to recall in my youth where we just naively played pin-the-tail-on-the-donkey, ate cake and ice cream, ran around outside, and, well, I guess that was about it. But I could never understand why all those grown-ups looked so tense. Now I do.

Try some unusual themes

Today's over-programmed, overstimulated children must be clamoring to be adults, because they have seen it and done it all, before they even reach the age of seven. Beyond the usual video parties, indoor playgrounds, singers, clowns, and magicians, there are makeup parties, space shuttle launches, off-Broadway theatre productions and skydiving to name a few. Just make sure you plan it well, or else you'll find yourself in a situation like I did of having half an hour left, no props and a roomful of newly energized post-cake 6-year-olds. Talk about pressure!

So, for those parents struggling to come up with new ideas that today's jaded youngsters haven't yet experienced, may I suggest the following home-based, weatherproof themes that are novel, educational and practical, yet inexpensive. You also won't have to worry about not filling the time.

The Cleaning party: Tell all the guests to come in schmutzik clothes, hand each one a sponge and mop. This can be great fun, useful for you and guaranteed to be different from anything they do at home. Can be applied to Pesach cleaning (my personal favorite), Mom or Dad's car, gardening (especially challenging in February). Just be sure to feed them cake first, then make the most of that energy surge.

The Mini-parliament/UN party: Give the kids a topic to debate or reach consensus and two hours to decide on how to proceed. Unless following Taiwanese parliamentary rules, violence is not allowed. Don't be surprised if the results look a lot like the real House of Commons or the UN. Easily adaptable to shul committees by deciding for example, who should get the third aliyah or what type of herring should be served for kiddush on Shabbat morning.

The Family budgeting party: Sit everybody down and force them to devise a hypothetical family budget to afford mortgage/rent, child care and/or day school tuition, shul dues, tzedakah, food, clothing, toys and games, summer camp and vacation on a not-so-hypothetical income (yours). Remember, no cheating with third incomes. Illustrates that money does not spontaneously pop out of automatic tellers machines when cash is low.

The Day at the Office party: Create a simulated work environment. Hold long, boring meetings, serve endless "coffee" (hot chocolate), make unreasonable demands under impossible timeframes, practice petty politics, cut back wages and announce impending layoffs.

Just choose any one of these ideas and pretty soon the kids will be clamoring for you to teach them that really interesting game you used to play at your parties, like "that donkey thing." They may even be willing to not grow up so fast.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

My son is 38 years old. He has a graduate degree and over 10 years of experience. But since he lost his job six years ago, he's been managing a computer store and earning not much more than minimum wage. I'm so upset for him. He often works 60 to 70 hours a week! He could do so much better for himself, but he doesn't want to try. I set him up for counselling and he refused to go. What should I do?

Dear Reader,

Unfortunately, the best thing you can do is leave him alone.

Sometimes, people are unwilling to continually upgrade their skills. We don't know why. Perhaps it's fear or stubbornness. Perhaps they believe they are so knowledgeable that employers should be begging for them. Either way, the job market today is not the same as it has been before and attitudes like this don't get people jobs. To further complicate the situation, because technology is developing at such a fast pace, if a person neglects upgrading their skills, they just can't complete.

If your son is content where he is, leave him alone. The best you can do is support him in leading the kind of life he has chosen.

If your son says he is unhappy, you might buy him a self-help book, something that might motivate him into examining the direction his life is taking. Or you might consider offering to pay for a self-improvement course in an area that you think he might enjoy and has very little to do with his working experience.

Whatever you do, don't tell him how worried you are about him. Keep up a brave face and try getting yourself interested in some sort of course or new hobby so that your mind will be occupied with something other than your son's situation. Of course, there is also the possibility that your actions may motivate your son to action too!

Israel fills treasury post

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu earlier this week appointed Yaacov Ne'eman as finance minister to replace Dan Meridor, who resigned his portfolio last month. In the process, Netanyahu resolved a 3-week-old crisis involving the confidence of his cabinet ministers, which at various times threatened to bring down his coalition government.

Ne'eman's appointment came as a surprise to many, especially as Ariel Sharon had been rumored for weeks to be headed to the post.

Ne'eman, a law professor, was originally appointed justice minister in Netanyahu's cabinet. But he resigned last August to face charges of obstructing justice.

After Ne'eman was cleared of all wrongdoing, Netanyahu offered him his old cabinet job, which Ne'eman declined. But at the height of the latest coalition crisis, he agreed to accept the vacant Treasury and finance post.

The most recent cabinet difficulties arose from Foreign Minister David Levy's anger with the revelations that Sharon had secretly met with the Palestinian Authority to discuss the continuation of the peace process. Apparently, the prime minister had known of and had approved of the Sharon meeting without sharing the information with his foreign minister.

As part of the new cabinet arrangements, Netanyahu also announced he would "consult" from "time to time" with Levy, Mordechai and Sharon on diplomatic issues "as needed." The entire peace process, it was announced, is to be handled by Levy. Officials in Netanyahu's office working on the peace process will coordinate all steps and new initiatives directly with the foreign minister.

Reports Monday morning said Levy and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai had joined forces to prevent Sharon, national infrastructure minister, from becoming finance minister and were the key figures who persuaded Ne'eman to enter the cabinet by accepting the finance portfolio.

Alleged Nazi named

Mamertas Rolland Maciukas, 73, is alleged to have collaborated with German forces in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus) in 1941 as a member of the 2nd Auxiliary Police Battalion. The unit was later renamed the 2nd Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft Battalion and afterwards was known as the 12th Schutzmannschaft Battalion.

Jewish groups urge race relations policies

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish groups are urging the federal government to implement race relations policies and screening mechanisms for racists in the military in the wake of the Somalia commission's report.

The groups also slammed the government for its "dismissive attitude" towards the report and for continuing to "undermine the inquiry."

Both Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada were given standing before the commission on questions pertaining to racism in the military. The commission was created after reports surfaced that a Somali looter was killed "execution style" and that a 16-year-old Somali, Shidane Arone, was tortured and killed in 1993 by soldiers of the Canadian Airborne Regiment (CAR) during peacekeeping duties in Somalia.

The 2,000-page report released last week contains several recommendations addressing the issue of racism in the military that should be adopted "to eliminate racist tendencies," said Keith Landy, national legal counsel for Canadian Jewish Congress.

The report stated "at the time of the deployment, the Canadian Forces had no policies denying enrolment to active racists, prohibiting involvement in racist organizations or participation in their activ-

The News in Brief

ISRAEL

Suing Parents

JERUSALEM — In an unprecedented ruling in Israel, a district court has ruled that children can sue their parents for physical and emotional damage sustained from neglect. The Tel Aviv court decision came in a civil case filed by two brothers and a sister against their father.

The siblings maintained that they were emotionally disabled after their father sent them to institutions when they were very young, after the suicide of their mother.

Vigil for MiAs

JERUSALEM — Families of three missing Israeli soldiers held a vigil opposite the Knesset last week in an effort to raise awareness of their plight.

Staff Sgt. Zvi Feldman, Sgt. Yehuda Katz and Sgt. Zachary Baumel were captured in June 1982, during a Syrian-Israeli tank battle in Lebanon's Bekaa Valley.

A string of Israeli political and military leaders visited the vigil, pledging to do what they can to find the missing soldiers.

Weizmann Program

REHOVOT — Winners of their nations' top science competitions are among the participants in the Weizmann Institute of Science's 29th Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Institute from July 2 to Aug. 1.

The annual summer program brings together top high school graduates from around the world and offers them the opportunity to learn directly from scientists at the Weizmann Institute.

The 29th Summer Science Institute will be attended by 72 students from 17 countries, including five from Canada.

Undercover in Hebron

JERUSALEM — Masked Israeli undercover units took Palestinian demonstrators in Hebron by surprise last week when they began arresting stone-throwers after first mingling with them.

News reports said at least seven rioters were detained by undercover troops, and that the demonstrations died down following the arrests.

Jordanians Nabbed

JERUSALEM — Jordanian police last week arrested a graphic designer who had posted a "no Israelis" sign in his window.

It was the second arrest in as many days of a Jordanian for posting what was termed an anti-Semitic message. The previous day, a shopkeeper was detained for several hours for having a sign in his supermarket stating "No dogs. No Jews."

Abraham Fund

JERUSALEM — The Abraham Fund, an organization established to enhance coexistence, has moved to increase awareness in Israel about issues related to Jewish-Arab coexistence by forming a council of 61 prominent Jews and Arabs who make up the mosaic of Israeli society.

WORLD

Jews in Miami

NEW YORK — The Jewish population of Greater Miami, one of the largest concentrations of Jews in the United States, is steadily declining, according to a recent study.

The study found that the total Jewish population of Florida's Dade County, an area commonly known as Greater Miami, has dropped eight percent over the past three years to 152,500.

The 1994 Jewish Demographic Study of Dade County found 166,000 Jews living in the area.

The county's Jewish population has been in decline since its peak in 1975 at 248,000.

CAJE Conference

PALO ALTO, Calif. — Jewish educators from around North America will be Stanford University in August for the 22nd annual Conference on Alternatives in Jewish Education (CAJE).

This year's CAJE conference will include 50 teens with an interest in Jewish education and 28 college students who are considering a career in Jewish education or communal experience.

Deportation Case

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department has initiated deportation proceedings against a Philadelphia man who served as an officer and platoon commander in a Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian police unit.

Legal documents filed by the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations (OSI) allege that Jonas Stelmokas, 80, a retired architect, volunteered for service in the Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft in July 1941 and served until August 1944 when he was transferred to the German air force.

The deportation proceedings follow a U.S. District Court finding that Stelmokas misrepresented his wartime activities when he received a U.S. visa in 1949.

Toronto Board of Rabbis' statement on unity

TORONTO — The Toronto Board of Rabbis — representing a wide spectrum of Jewish beliefs and practices while, at the same time, promoting mutual respect and cooperation between all branches of Judaism — endorses the statement, issued by Jewish organizations in the United States and elsewhere, which affirms our common responsibility to work for unity in the House of Israel.

We, therefore, deplore and repudiate any pronouncement by any group that attempts to disenfranchise branches of Judaism.

We urge the members of the Knesset to desist from debates and decisions concerning Jewish status and related issues, which exacerbate divisions within Jewry.

We appeal to the leaders of all political parties in Israel to accept the reality of a variety of Jewish religious expressions and not allow expediency to threaten the bond between Israel and the Diaspora, essential for Jewish survival.

We appeal to the leaders and members of the Jewish community in Canada to make renewed efforts to work together as one people.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Baycrest gets $18.9 million from Queen's Park

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care got some good news last week from the provincial government: Queen's Park has approved $18.9 million in funding for a major Baycrest project.

The money gives the green light to the development of the Apotex Centre, the Jewish Home for the Aged and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, touted by Baycrest as a cutting-edge facility for tomorrow's seniors.

Based on the approval of funds, Baycrest has put out tenders for the project and a groundbreaking ceremony is planned. Construction should take about 18 months.

"This news calls for a celebration," Baycrest president and CEO Stephen Herbert enthused in a memo to staff.

Herbert said the funds give "an exciting push" to Baycrest's two-year, $60-million fundraising campaign, which ends next month. Over $50 million has been raised to date.

The project has been in the works for a decade. Dubbed the Apotex Centre after chief benefactor and Apotex chair Barry Sherman, it will replace the current 372-bed Jewish Home for the Aged and add 100 new beds. The addition will be known as the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, and will focus on older adults whose cognitive abilities have been damaged by stroke and other ailments.

Plans call for the home to care for elderly people with progressive illnesses, like Alzheimer disease.

The new funding is a capital grant and separate from last week's announcement by the Ontario government that it will increase spending on nursing homes across the province by $100 million.

Baycrest's reaction to that announcement was lukewarm. The new funding is a good example of Queen's Park giving money with one hand just as it has taken away with the other, said Moshe Greengarten, vice-president of Baycrest's public and community affairs.

"It's a good thing and it will help us somewhat, but all it really does is offset past cuts," Greengarten said.

Ontario Health Minister Jim Wilson announced that the Mike Harris government will "reinvest" $100 million in long-term health care facilities, including nursing homes and homes for the aged.

He said $70 million will go toward nursing and personal care; $20 million to dietary services, housekeeping and maintenance; and $10 million to enhancing "quality of life," including physiotherapy and exercise programs.

The new funds are good news for Jewish seniors, said Greengarten. "The government is beginning to recognize that costs are shifting from hospitals to long-term care.

"But based on a preliminary look, all this does is offset previous funding cuts."

For example, funding reductions by the province have meant that the Jewish Home for the Aged has had its budget slashed by $6 million over five years, or $1.2 million annually.

And Baycrest's hospital has seen its budget cut by $1.8 million over the past two years.

Greengarten feels that overall, Baycrest will probably still be behind where it was prior to the first round of cuts two years ago.

The Health Ministry counters that the new funding will translate into 16 more hours of nursing and personal care a day for every 100 nursing home residents.

And it says the funds will create over 2,000 new jobs in the homes, most of them for nurses, nursing assistants and other health care providers.

Greengarten said the possibility of new staffing isn't a big factor at Baycrest because past cutbacks have resulted in "far larger" staff reductions than the new funding can make up for.

Stephen Schneiderman, executive director of Hillel Lodge/Ottawa Jewish Home for the Aged, welcomed the news from Queen's Park.

"It's a step in the right direction. We're pleased with a recognition that expenses are escalating," Schneiderman said.

But faced with $150,000 in cuts since 1995, any new money will "simply stop the bleeding" at Hillel Lodge, a 48-bed non-profit home for the Jewish aged, he said.

The government also pointed out last week that in the next 20 years, the number of senior citizens in Ontario will increase from the current 1.4 million to 3 million. As well, the average age of a senior entering a nursing home has risen to 85.

Baycrest's own numbers project that by 2011, 25 percent of Metro's Jews will be 65 or over, and the largest growth will be in the over 85 age group.

Last year, the Harris Tories announced $170 million in new spending on home care for seniors. Most community leaders said that was a sign the government wants seniors to stay at home for as long as possible.

CANADIAN TEENAGERS KNOW THEIR IDENTITY

Four Canadians were among the finalists at the International Jewish Identity Competition held last month in Basel, Switzerland. The competition was organized by the Israel Ministry of Education and the International Centre of Jewish Identity at Bar-Ilan University to coincide with the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist Congress in Basel. Approximately 60,000 youngsters aged 11 to 16 from 38 countries in the Diaspora took part in the contest. Nearly 140,000 Israeli youngsters also participated in the contest. Seen in this photo are the four Canadian finalists at a ceremony in the garden of Beit Hanassi in Jerusalem standing beside a bust of the late president, Chaim Herzog. A week's worthy reading

Every week across my desk, I receive newspapers, journals, periodicals and magazines from across the Jewish world.

Of course, in those many papers and periodicals, I come across a great deal of writing that is informative, thoughtful and occasionally even inspiring.

As opportunity allows from time to time, I like to bring small excerpts from even a small sampling of those writings to the attention of CJN readers.

Here, for example, are just a few worthy reads from last week's mail.

• In the Jewish Week of New York (June 27), Rabbi Lawrence A. Hoffman comments on parshat Shelach. He is an unusual writer in that he combines a rare, gentle writing style with hard-hitting, insightful, substantive thought.

In this column, Hoffman reflects specifically upon the modern-day lessons and applications arising out of the negative and pessimistic report brought back to the people of Israel by 10 of the 12 spies whom Moshe sent to inspect the land of Canaan.

"Individuals require communities, and the basic unit of community is the minyan. But individuals must prevent the community from accepting an "evil report" on the state of the world...

"Individuals have two levels of responsibility. Like Joshua, [one of the two spies who resisted the negative report of the majority,] we must speak up in the face of an "evil report," even if we are all alone in doing so and we think our words will go unheeded. Joshua had an ally, Caleb, and even the two of them were unable to sway the spies. But at least they protested. At its most extreme, think of the Holocaust, which would not have happened if the masses of ordinary Germans had not gone along in silent complicity...

"Judaism does not favor heroes who are loners: ascetic monks, ivory-tower scholars and Wild West-style rugged individualists. It charges instead, 'Do not separate yourself from the community.' [See The CJN, From the Editor's Desk, June 26.] And it requires its own form of courage, courage in community, where each of us must act."

• In the Jerusalem Report (July 10), the reliable, well-informed Ehud Ya'ari reminds readers that the Iran-watching "experts" in the United States failed to predict the recent election of Muhammad Khatemi as president. However, despite their failure to correctly analyze the unfolding political developments in Iran, they are now urging the American administration to revise its policy of containing Iran and in its place, "extend a hand to Khatemi."

The assessment of Israel's security establishment is contrary to that of the United States.

"Israel...is recommending the opposite. It asks Washington to step up the pressure on Iran in the hope of sharpening the internal crisis there. For Uri Lubrani [who holds the Iran portfolio at the Ministry of Defence] "rapprochement with Iran is akin to appeasement of the Nazis."

"The central point for Israel must be that the chances of deterring Iran from developing an atomic bomb are better under embargo than in a climate of business-as-usual. [Our emphasis.] The more investments are allowed to flow in, the more holes in the dam."

• In Justice, (December 1966), the Journal of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, Dr. Shmuel Berkovitz, an expert on the history of the holy places in Israel, wrote an essay entitled The Holy Places in Jerusalem: Legal Aspects.

At the very outset of his article he deals with the contention that eastern Jerusalem was occupied territory and that as such, Israel had no right to annex it and to apply Israeli law there.

"In this regard, I accept the opinions of E. Lauterpacht, Prof. I. Blum (Israel's past ambassador to the UN), S. Schwebal and M. Gruhin. In their view, upon the termination of the British Mandate, a 'vacuum in sovereignty' was created over Palestine, including Jerusalem, which should have been filled upon Jerusalem turning into an international city in a accordance with the UN Partition Plan (29.11.47). Accordingly, the conquest of east Jerusalem by Jordan in May 1948 was an unlawful act of aggression, which did not confer any rights upon Jordan, as was evidenced by the fact that apart from Pakistan, no country in the world (and no Arab country) officially recognized the lawfulness of Jordan's rule over east Jerusalem.

"As opposed to Jordan, Israel captured east Jerusalem within the framework of a lawful act of self-defense during the Six day War, following the shelling of western Jerusalem by Jordan. (Jordan ignored Israel's pronouncements that the latter had no intention of attacking Jordan and disregarded Israel's requests that Jordan also refrain from attacking her.) Thus, Israel acquired the sovereignty over east Jerusalem in a lawful manner, and in any event, Israel's rights in that part of the city are superior to the rights of Jordan there."

He reported that "$13 trillion (US) was the value of all securities in all the stock exchanges around the world on Jan. 1 of this year. The prices of stocks around the world increased an average of 13 percent. Only in three countries did the value of the stocks decline." (But he did not identify the countries!)

• The front page of the Jerusalem Post (editor's note: not the international edition, but rather the regular edition) of July 2 announced: "Montreal wins Battle of Canada." This was a reference to the result of the first inter-league baseball game at Skydome in Toronto between the Expos and the Blue Jays which the Expos won by one run: 2-1. A report of the game was the lead story on the sports page that day.

This editorial decision is undoubtedly a reflection of the facts that the chairman of the Board is F. David Radler of Vancouver, that the president and publisher of the paper is Norman Spector, formerly of Montreal, and perhaps that the features editor is Leora Eren Frucht, formerly The CJN correspondent in Israel.

Netanyahu gets top marks for political skills

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite a series of recent scandals, Benjamin Netanyahu's credibility is "not as damaged as people would like to believe," says the managing editor of The Jerusalem Report.

Although he himself is "not a fan" of the Israeli prime minister, award-winning journalist David Horovitz, a co-founder of the glossy seven-year-old magazine, waxed enthusiastic about the former's political skills.

"Netanyahu is a terrific politician," said Horovitz in an interview at UJA Federation's Toronto offices, where he also met recently with community leaders. "He campaigns incredibly hard, he tours the country and he's wonderful on television."

David Horovitz

Horovitz, a 34-year-old native of London, England, with a degree in International Relations from The Hebrew University of Jerusalem, believes Netanyahu will be hard to unseat, but that Ehud Barak is "the most credible figure Labor could have found," giving the party its best chance for a comeback.

The key issues for Israelis are peace and security, he said. "What we really want is security. We don't want to die unnatural deaths. There's no real argument about peace. The argument is over the price."

The forays of Israel's Orthodox and Russian immigrant populations into party politics have saddened Horovitz. "It stains what they stand for."

He painted former refusenik — and former Report staffer — Natan Sharansky, Israel's Minister of Trade and Industry, as a poignant case, someone who has been lampooned on a satirical Israeli television show and whose threats to resign over the Bar-On affair, for example, were met with cynicism.

"He was a hero until he went into politics a year ago. He remains the wonderful man he was, but politics has stained him. To call him a laughingstock is not far off the mark."

Netanyahu made unnecessary concessions to the religious right to secure a political coalition, Horovitz believes.

"If he had hung tough, they could not have joined anyone else." The resulting controversy over Israel's proposed conversion bill could have been avoided, he said.

Because Israel has small Reform and Conservative communities, the average Israeli hasn't a clue about the issue, he said. "It's not that they don't care about this crisis. They don't know about it."

Because of pressure from American Reform and Conservative Jewry, the bill has been stopped in its tracks, Horovitz noted. Rather than lament the controversy, he prefers to emphasize what he sees as a strong link between Israel and the Diaspora.

"You can look at it as a positive case of Diaspora Jewry knocking on the door, saying 'Hey guys, wake up.'"

The Jerusalem Report covered the issue as early as January, said Horovitz. Although it's sometimes a challenge for the bi-weekly magazine to remain topical, particularly because it takes time to reach overseas subscribers, "we like to think we have time to research things better. We try to get beyond the headlines."

Horovitz said he regrets not having given more attention to the threat posed by Jewish extremists prior to the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin in November 1995. Although the Report did address the issue about three months earlier, in hindsight, he feels it should have been given more prominence.

A recent issue featured a rare cover story on Louis Farrakhan, leader of the Nation of Islam, and a four-page look at the life of a Conservative rabbi in Israel: Jewish, Observant and Illegal. Israeli politics are generally covered in depth, and the magazine's arts and business sections offer an eclectic look at some issues not necessarily familiar to Diaspora Jews.

The Report, which has a circulation of about 50,000 (with two-thirds of the readership in North America), offers the "whole gamut of opinion," said Horovitz. "We try to be as straight as we can, to tell it like it is."

Police lay hate charges for anti-Muslim pamphlets

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's rarely-used hate law was dusted off last week, as a man from rural Ontario was charged with three counts of promoting hatred against an identifiable group.

The charges stem from distribution of two pamphlets and a pre-recorded telephone message that attacked Muslims, said Sgt. Dino Doria of the Metropolitan Toronto Police hate crime unit.

One of the pamphlets, distributed to students at Weston Collegiate High School, repeatedly attacks the Islamic faith in tones usually associated with anti-Jewish propagandists.

The pamphlet suggests Muslims in Toronto "sound peaceful and try to act peaceful, but underneath their false sheep's clothing are raging wolves, seeking whom they may devour and Toronto is definitely on their hit list."

The pamphlet also describes Islam as a "false religion," a "violent religion," and it suggests Muslims in Toronto are no different than "Muslim believers" in Algeria who have committed bloody atrocities.

Doria said only three weeks passed from the time police were alerted to the material to the laying of charges. Police received complaints from spokespersons from the Muslim community who believed the material was "blatant" hate propaganda, he said.

Jewish groups applaud move

Jewish community organizations applauded police for acting quickly to lay charges and they commended Attorney General Charles Harnick for approving the charges. Under Canada's anti-hate laws, consent of the attorney general is necessary before a case can proceed.

"Now that the attorney general has finally gotten his feet wet, a strong message has been sent out to Ernst Zundel that maybe you're next," said Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Zundel is a Nazi apologist who distributes Holocaust-denial material that Congress believes warrants hate promotion charges. Zundel, who has been charged under the now defunct "false news" section of the Criminal Code, has never been charged under the anti-hate law.

Farber said the anti-Muslim material comes squarely under the parameters of the anti-hate law. He suggested that the material "could have been a tinderbox... It could lead to violence."

Karen Mock, director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said the League supports the laying of charges. "It is important to stand together [with the Islamic community] against hate," she said. "The victim impact of this kind of propaganda is not to be underestimated, especially when it is targeted to vulnerable young people."

Charged with promoting hatred is Mark Harding, 44, of the Meaford area of northern Ontario.

Though the flyers bore the name the Christian Standard, Doria said that organization appears to be a one-man show involving only Harding.

"He's not associated with any known group," he said.

The Christian Standard is described on one of the leaflets as "a self-supporting group of Christian soldiers serving God and our Lord Jesus Christ, in Canada and around the world."

Racism, inter-group hostility on interfaith agenda

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Student Intern

TORONTO — A Jewish anti-racist educator, an Islamic scholar and a Catholic priest discussed racism and hostility between groups at a recent forum on Interfaith Dialogue on Human Rights.

"Regrettably, in Ontario, religious prejudice still bedevils our society. We have white supremacist groups...There are still people who would desecrate Jewish synagogues and cemeteries," said the evening's moderator Mervin Witter, Ontario regional director of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Karen Mock, national director of the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada, began her presentation by describing the following incident: Before she left for the forum, she said, she received a call from a distressed person who had received an anti-Semitic phone call, in the form of a threatening tape-recorded message accusing Jews of being the Antichrist and warning, "We are going to get you."

Mock emphasized that anti-racist and human rights work is about putting yourself in the other person's shoes. She quoted a saying by the prophet Hillel: "Separate not thyself from thy community and do not judge another person until you have been in his place".

She also told of reaching out to Toronto's Arab and Muslim communities at the height of the Gulf War. She awoke on a Friday morning in January, opened the newspaper and read of Muslim and Arab Canadians being called names and being harassed in schools and in the workplace. When she went to work, there were seven calls reporting incidents of attacks on Jewish schools, synagogues, and student unions in North York.

That January morning was significant, Mock said. "At the same time [as] we dispatched people to help in the Jewish institutions, I picked up the phone and reached out to our Muslim and Arab colleagues in anti-racist human rights work and said, 'Let's get together so we can ensure human rights are not violated in this country.'"

A Muslim-Jewish dialogue program was set up, she said, and leaders of the Muslim and Arab communities were invited to the B'nai Brith offices, where they were given guidelines and strategies for protecting their religious institutions.

Mock said she and the League for Human Rights draw on certain principles of the Jewish faith in their work. "The tenets of the Jewish faith that I draw on are equality, justice, welcoming the stranger, tzedakah or charity, tshuvah [repentance], prayer and faith and also a very important concept — that of mitzvah, doing good deeds and fulfilling the commandments."

Father Timothy Macdonald, director of the Office of Ecumenism and Interfaith Affairs of the Roman Catholic Church, emphasized that the roots of Christianity are in faith and charity. He said all people are created in the image of G-d.

"I hope that this meeting will be a kind of figurative planting of olive trees of peace, justice and concord in the city of Toronto," he said.

Prof. Muhammad Tahir-ul-Qadri, an Islamic philosopher and thinker, emphasized that Islam is an inclusive, not an exclusive religion.

"Islam is the religion of human rights and peace," he said.

Qadri discussed the situation which arose in 1995 after the Oklahoma bombing. At that time, without investigation or inquiry, the media claimed the person responsible for the bombing was Arab or Muslim, he said.

Qadri also stressed that we are all equal and that no man is superior to another.

Mock told The CJN that the major human rights problems facing the Jewish community are racism, anti-Semitism and the lack of will to prosecute Nazi war criminals.

"Whether it's overt slurs or hate propaganda, all of these issues have to get our attention," she said.

To combat racism, Mock advises people to report all violence to the proper authorities. "We should take action. If we're silent, we're just condoning the anti-Semitism and racism," she said.

Klein helps ensure camp runs smooth

TORONTO — If you've ever called the Toronto office of Camp Shalom, chances are you've spoken to Malka Klein.

As camp administrator, Klein is the first person parents reach when they inquire about the Zionist overnight camp for children up to age 13, affiliated with Canadian Young Judaea.

"I feel that the camp's image depends on me. If parents are satisfied by the way they've been treated on their initial phone call, they'll take the next step. Its too easy to lose people on inquiry calls. I can be on the phone for more than 20 minutes with a mother shopping around for camps for her child."

Klein, who works in the camp's Marlee Avenue office during the year and at its Gravenhurst site in the summer months, is, among other tasks, in charge of camper registration and camp advertising.

"I know parents are busy and I like to go that extra mile. I'll do in-home camp presentations and I often drop off registration forms to parents' homes. I try to be honest about the camp and I try and tell parents if I feel the camp is not right for their child."

Klein understands how difficult it is for some kids to go to overnight camp for the first time and she does her best to match campers.

"If a camper doesn't know anyone going to camp, I'll try to match them with someone so they can get together with them before the summer. As well, I do everything possible to honor campers' requests about sharing cabins with their friends. If it's not possible, I call them before camp begins. I don't want them to have any surprises when they get to camp."

She is also available at the camp bus, in case campers or their parents have any last-minute concerns. "I know those first few minutes of the camp experience are crucial."

Malka Klein

In the summer, Klein "does everything that has to do with the communication between staff and parents. I like to think I have diplomatic genes because my father served in the Israel foreign service. It was from him that I learned how to keep open the lines of communication. Parents are free to call me, confidentially, all summer if they are nervous about their children."

A teacher by profession, Klein says, "I love going to camp — this job was carved in stone for me. Imagine waking up in the morning to go to work, putting on a pair of shorts and walking to an office that overlooks a lake.

"I also get to enjoy a little bit of camp. If they need someone for the staff play, I'm always available and although its mostly the parents and staff I deal with, I do make friends with the campers."

Jewish woman, Polish Catholic rescuer reunited

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rose Weinberg and Leonarda (Lucy) Martul Budrikiene disprove the aphorism that blood is thicker than water. They are not related, but their relationship is extraordinarily close and affecting.

Leonarda and her late mother, Josephina, pious Polish Catholics, saved Rose from certain death when she was an infant in the Vilnius (Vilna) ghetto. In Nazi-occupied Lithuania, they opened their hearts and their arms to Rose, a Jewish baby whose parents, Yosef and Hinda Levin, were murdered during the Holocaust.

Rose lived with them in Vilnius for 17 years, through the Nazi and Soviet eras, until she came to Canada to live with her father's sister, Rita Freedman, and her late husband, Harry.

Last month, Rose and Leonarda were reunited. Leonarda, a rough-hewn woman who had never set foot outside Vilnius, suddenly found herself aboard an airplane bound for Toronto to attend the wedding of Rose's son.

Last week, Rose, 56, and Leonarda, 70, who consider themselves sisters, reminisced about the past, recalling the tragic events which unfolded in Vilnius beginning in 1941.

According to Leonarda, Rose was two months old when she was spirited out of the ghetto in the sleeve of a smuggler's coat pocket. Her parents stayed behind with their 5-year-old daughter, Chayele, who would also perish during the war.

The smuggler, who was paid for his services, left Rose in the care of a Christian family outside the ghetto. The arrangement did not work out, and soon Rose was in the hands of Josephina and Leonarda, who had a passing acquaintance with the smuggler.

"Lucy convinced her mother to take me in," said Rose. "She wanted a sister. She was an only child."

With the agreement of her estranged husband, and at the risk of her life, Josephina adopted Rose. Baptized and renamed Vera Martul, Rose was raised as a Catholic and was a regular church-goer, unaware of her Jewish background until much later.

"Lucy and her mother never thought they were doing anything special," recalled Rose. "I was regarded as a member of the family, and Lucy treated me like a sister. To this day, she calls me her 'little sister.'"

Speaking in Russian, one of several languages she is fluent in, Leonarda said, "We always considered her a part of the family. We never stopped helping her."

Toward the end of the war, the smuggler threatened to tell the Germans about Rose if he was not compensated. The Martuls had no money and awaited a knock on the door by the Germans. "We were ready to die," said Rose plaintively.

At this point, to their everlasting relief, the Red Army marched into Vilnius, sending the Germans fleeing and neutralizing the smuggler's threat.

After the war, a distant cousin found Rose, but she remained with the Martuls. Josephina died when Rose was 12, and Leonarda was essentially her guardian after that.

When Rose was 14, Harry and Rita Freedman tracked her down in Vilnius. Yet Rose had no desire to be separated from the Martuls. "I didn't know another life," she explained, although by then, she knew she was Jewish.

During the next few years, the Freedmans sent the Martuls food and clothing parcels and Harry corresponded with Leonarda in Polish.

In 1958, when Rose was 17, the Freedmans brought her to Toronto via Poland. She agreed to leave Vilnius because she thought she could help the Martuls, who were all but impoverished.

Rose adapted well to Canada, learning English and studying at Bloor Collegiate and at a secretarial college. The Freedmans were kind step-parents. "Nothing was too good for me. They gave me back my childhood."

During the intervening years, Rose never lost touch with Leonarda, who had in the meantime married a Soviet Army officer and had four children. Rose herself was wed in 1963. She and her first husband had two children, Eve and Michael.

In the late 1980s, Rose and her second husband, Nathan Weiss, an American businessman with properties in Canada, visited Leonarda in Vilnius.

"We were appalled by the condition of her home," said Rose. "She had no toilet or running water."

To ease Leonarda's plight, Rose left money behind. In 1996, on her third visit to Vilnius, she and Nathan bought Leonarda, by now a widow, a fully-furnished apartment. And Nathan started sending Leonarda a monthly allowance to cover her daily expenses.

Last year, Yad Vashem — the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem — honored Leonarda and Josephina as Righteous Gentiles. Leonarda then became eligible for a small pension from a U.S. Holocaust survivors' fund.

Leonarda, whom Rose describes as a fair, honest, good-natured and extremely intelligent person, has had a wonderful time in Toronto. But she is going back home on July 16. "It's very nice here," said Leonarda, "but where I was born I want to be."

Rose will miss her, this salt-of-the-earth lady who saved her life one dark day 56 years ago.

Abominable attack

The current political atmosphere between Israel and the Palestinians is a tinderbox crackling with the threatening dry heat and high octane vapors of mutually falling hopes, widening mistrust and constant recriminations. Any spark tossed into this highly-charged atmosphere could ignite a conflagration.

The repugnant act last week of a young Jewish woman who distributed posters in Hebron depicting the prophet Mohammed as a pig with a pen writing the Koran, came perilously close to being that spark. One young Palestinian was killed last week, and scores more Palestinians and Israelis were injured in rioting in the territories, which Israeli officials admitted was the immediate aftermath of the appearance of the insulting leaflet. But we may not yet have seen the full fallout.

Hamas has threatened to avenge what their leader in Nablus, Sheik Jamal Mansour, called the "humiliation" of their prophet. Mansour warned that his organization would soon initiate a deadly campaign of death against Jews reminiscent of the suicide bombings two years ago.

To be sure, the poster was probably a pretext for some of the rioters. Extremists and haters of Jews, like Mansour, do not need new reasons to justify their hatred. Undoubtedly, much of the rioting had been planned prior to the appearance of the poster. And there is irrefutable evidence that the Palestinian Authority has been alternatively inciting the rioters or failing to restrain them.

But there is no denying the outrageous nature of the act by the 25-year-old Israeli. Thankfully, she is in custody and will soon face the full force of the law for her actions. It appears she acted alone.

The leaders of Israel quickly and decisively condemned her actions. Mincing no words, Prime Minister Netanyahu called it "an abominable and despicable attack on Islam." President Ezer Weizman referred to it as contemptible. Both of them telephoned the mayor of Hebron to express their outrage. The Jewish community in Hebron also denounced the poster. The crude caricature represents everything that is reprehensible and frightening in the tinderbox of the peace process. It is reprehensible because it offends the respect that Judaism confers upon Islam. But it is frightening because it so easily lends itself to exploitation by the extremist religious forces intent on converting the clash of competing nationalisms into a clash of competing religions and to thereby destroy any possibilities for peace and coexistence between the two peoples.

Mars musing

It was one of those unique coincidences, a miracle of timing, that inspired a knowing smile. Last weekend, humanity's surrogate explorer, the little, mechanical robot, Sojourner, broadcast signals back to earth from the planet Mars some 120 million miles away. We were left with goosebumps when we saw actual photos of the dry, dusty, rock-strewn Martian surface.

But also last weekend, in every Jewish community on this planet, worshippers celebrated the new month of Tammuz with the lyric poetry of the Hallel, two verses of which were somehow particularly relevant to the explorations being carried out that very moment, so far away on Mars. "The heavens are the heavens for God; earth was given over to humankind." It was a timely reminder that however far and however high mankind's curiosity and thirst for knowledge lead, we must go there with a sense of awe and humility, and always for the sake of the betterment of life here on earth.

Keep Pol Pot out of Canada

Ottawa should not extradite former Khmer Rouge leader Pol Pot from Cambodia to face an international tribunal for crimes against humanity for his role in the murder of millions of Cambodians from 1975 to 1979.

If it does, Ottawa may as well just welcome him with open arms to Canada where, guaranteed our Canadian constitutional rights and freedoms, Pol Pot would be able to live out the rest of his life in relative peace and obscurity, as have the thousands of Nazis and other war criminals before him, without fear of reprisal, prosecution or deportation.

Surely all decent and hard-working, true Canadian citizens, not to mention all of Pol Pot's victims, deserve a lot better than that. Instead, Ottawa should allow another country, one with a legitimate past record of bringing war criminals to justice, the responsibility of extraditing and trying Pol Pot for his crimes.

Y. Y. Rosenberg first rabbi of Beth Jacob

Re: "Beth Jacob celebrates 100th anniversary" (CJN, June 13), the article on the Beth Jacob Synagogue provided some interesting background about both Beth Jacob and the Toronto Jewish community.

May I, however, point out for your readers one important inaccuracy: It was Rabbi Yehuda Yudel Rosenberg who was the first rabbi of Beth Jacob and of the Polish Jewish community.

As Stephen Speisman relates in his book, The Jews of Toronto: A History to 1937, it was Rabbi Y. Y. Rosenberg who first served as rabbi of Beth Jacob, and served the community until his departure to Montreal, in 1918.

During his time in Toronto, Rabbi Rosenberg was a co-founder of the Polish Talmud Torah, which became the present Eitz Chaim School, and he served as superintendent of the school.

Best wishes to Beth Jacob on its anniversary.

Death penalty for selling land to Jews

The announcement by the justice minister of the Palestinian Authority that the death penalty will be imposed on anyone who is convicted of selling one inch of land to Israel is as retrograde a step as has yet to occur in the peace process.

While the discovery of a dead Arab land dealer in Jerusalem has not officially been linked to that policy, it is certainly incriminating that the mufti of Jerusalem denied the deceased a Muslim burial because, as a Muslim who sold land to Jews, he was considered an infidel. This is hardly the spirit of cooperation that would instil confidence and mutual respect between Arabs and Jews.

If the lawful sale of property to a Jew justifies capital punishment, then it is possible the next step would be something analogous to the infamous Nazi Nuremberg laws prohibiting all contact with Jews. Predictably, there will be no condemnation by organizations such as Amnesty International, nor a resolution of censure by the United Nations.

Archives a precious Jewish resource

In a recent edition of the Bulletin for the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (Spring 1997), Prof. Ira Robinson of Concordia University pointed out that the Jewish community in Canada "is endowed with a healthy number of archives focused specifically on the Canadian Jewish experience... and the Jewish community in particular is rarely conscious of archives and their importance."

In a time when the operational budgets of public institutions are consistently revised, the Canadian Jewish community should become aware of this valuable resource, which is no less than a priceless treasure of accumulated historical items by those that built our community. These collections remain a physical record not only of the establishment and growth of the Jewish people in Canada, but the very essence that will represent and educate future generations. How could we allow its very existence to be placed in jeopardy?

Therefore, it remains the responsibility of each one of us, not only Jews, but all concerned individuals, to take the time to become informed about this resource and actively inquire as to how one can support the continuance and maintenance of these recordings of Canadian Jewish heritage.

Perspectives

Ritual, ceremony mark traditional Tunisian wedding

The months of summer are often the months of nuptials. In acknowledgment of that fact, The CJN thought it would be interesting to examine marriage traditions, many of them no longer practised, among different Jewish communities. In this article, the author describes the customs and rites that accompanied a traditional Tunisian Jewish marriage.

By CLAUDE COHEN MATLOFSKY

Every traditional Tunisian Jewish marriage started with the efforts of the khattaba or samsara, (the matchmaker), who was usually well informed about the status of the families in the Jewish community. She would make proposals to prospective "marrying" families that included a precise description of the potential spouse as well as the details of the dowry and trousseau.

If the families, namely the parents, agreed, she had then to convince the potential bride and groom. There was an elaborate scenario in place for this purpose.

The intended bride and her family would wait in a luxurious public place until the future groom and his family passed before them, accompanied by the samsara.

If the candidate for bride did not please the young man, he continued on his way. If, on the other hand, he liked what he saw, negotiations would commence immediately, accompanied by the serving of soft drinks. And what if the young bride did not like his looks? She was generally out of luck. No one ever claimed that feminism had a Tunisian Jewish origin!

Once the principal lines of agreement had been reached regarding the marriage, the engagement arrangements were set in motion. These usually consisted of a family reception during which the intended marriage of the youngsters was officially publicly announced.

The young man offered a ring to his fiancée and then notaries delegated by the rabbinic tribunal were called in to write the kteba or ketubah, the marriage contract. It was written on parchment in Judeo-Arabic.

After the engagement, the period of the Amouri began, during which the giving of presents and small favors was considered to be de rigueur. During this time, the young couple began the process of getting to know each other better. However, this process of familiarization always took place in the company of a chaperone chosen from among either the future bride or groom's younger brothers or sisters.

As soon as the bride's trousseau was ready and appropriately furnished and decorated housing was found for the young couple, the marriage itself could proceed.

The marriage was preceded by the henna ceremony, a festive evening of partying and merriment that took place at the residence of the bride's future parents. The ceremony was known as the "henna" because of the custom of having a specialist called the Hennena apply some henna (red vegetable dye) to the palms as well as to the balls of the feet of the aroussa, the future bride. The henna is an ancient custom and forms part of the marriage traditions in Sephardi communities.

An extremely generous buffet was usually served on that occasion and there was always music provided by an orchestra.

With cries of joy, much laugher and a great deal of singing, the bride was given a basket that was also dyed with henna, containing candies, perfumes, cosmetics, scarves, shoes and jewelry. Very deliberately, before all those assembled, the basket was uncovered and displayed to all present.

The first Saturday following the henna ceremony was called the Saturday of the Hen. The bride's family prepared a hen for eating and sent it as a gift to the groom's family, who would keep half of the chicken and send the other half back to the mother of the bride. She would then cut it into small pieces that were shared with relatives and friends. Given the number of people who expected, or at least felt entitled to receive, a piece of the chicken, the pieces were undoubtedly very small. It was believed that if a single girl was lucky enough to receive a wing of the chicken, she would improve her chances of "flying" into her own marriage.

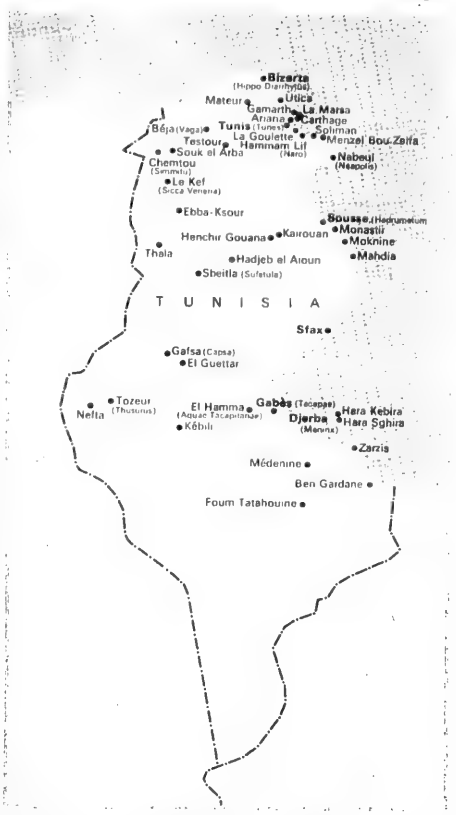
Then came the day of the Hammam, where the bride would go to a mikvah for the thila ceremony. A servant or a kharaja accompanied her, carrying the sar, the sheet in which all the clothing was wrapped that the bride was to wear at the conclusion of the thila. The kharaja was in charge of the intended bride's massage, cleansing and epilation.

Other assistants were in charge of the stal el hammam, (a finely decorated water bucket) of the tas el yed (basinette) used for a shower and of the qabitas, a three shelved box containing fel, (shampoo), jir (a type of soap) and dhab maqsour (epilatory powder). The thila was performed in the presence of the mother, sisters and female cousins of the groom.

The actual marriage ceremony took place at the synagogue or at the couple's future residence on the Sunday or Wednesday of the following week. It was usually followed by a reception.

Some time during the three days after the wedding, the contents of the marriage contract were entered into a registry at the community's rabbinical tribunal.

On the following Shabbat, the sheva brachot, seven blessings, were read. This marked the shebaa yem, a period of seven days, where the couple was invited to live a dolce farniente, a period during which the bride's needs were completely taken care of and the groom did not have to work but was allowed to divide his time between the synagogue and his new bride.



A Tunisian Jewish woman from the 19th century is seen in this photo wearing white pantaloons and a velvet kufia hat, the traditional garb of the place and era.

Finally, and as a crowning event there was the housewarming — Tunisian style — which consisted of a unique ceremony: the cutting of the fish.

A large fish, generally a sea perch or a mullet, was prepared for the couple in accordance with a very detailed and very precise formula.

A piece of steel or wood was placed delicately on top of the fish. Then, the young bride and groom were each given a knife. Customarily however, the groom's knife was of poor quality, while the bride's knife was very fine.

The groom was invited to begin cutting the fish from the head down, and the wife was to start from the tail up. Due to the disparity in the quality of the knives, the young wife was usually more successful at the task than her struggling husband. Seeing this, the guests would exclaim: "aroussa ghel betou," meaning the bride has defeated her husband. The fish was then fried and eaten. Its tail was washed and dried and very often occupied a spot in the newly-married couple's kitchen as an amulet against the evil eye.

The Tunisian Jewish wife benefited from double legal protection: from Mosaic law and from French law, which was applicable during the period of France's colonial rule over Tunisia. That explains why, as opposed to the experience in Europe at the beginning of the century, the number of agunot in Tunisia was almost nil.

Opinions

Letter from Kassel, Germany

By Emil Fackenheim in Germany

Some time ago, I promised to explain why I accepted an invitation to teach for a term at Kassel University, when 10 years ago I would have done no such thing. I say "10 years" advisedly.

Then, Kassel University sponsored a Franz Rosenzweig conference, attended by some 70 professors, the proceedings of which became a two volume work, better than anything American Judaism has yet produced.

Rosenzweig (who died in 1929) was born in Kassel. He was the greatest Jewish philosopher German Judaism has produced — just before it was murdered. I got the impression 10 years ago that the 70 professors, who had been betrayed by their own philosopher Martin Heidegger, sought counsel from Rosenzweig, a German Jew who died before the destruction of German Judaism started.

So I am at the best possible place and my experience thus far has been excellent. These young people are completely different than they were 60 years ago. My assistant has read all of Franz Kafka. And since before Hitler the professors and students were among the worst, there is room for optimism on this score.

Which makes it hard for me to tell them what Treblinka was really like. But of course I must, for am I going to talk to the nasty people?

One thing is deeply troubling, though. They want to hear about Israel but seem to assume that peace is just around the corner — not just the students — everybody.

So I try to make a breakthrough with the theologians, but that is no easy job either. In Atlanta, a young professor was introduced to me who said she had learned from me that Christian theology could not be the same after Auschwitz as before.

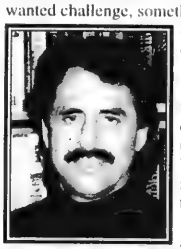
So what was her change? Instead of worrying about her soul, she worries about poverty in South America. I didn't have the heart to blast her, but here in Kassel (where I am getting the same thing) I'll do the blasting.

Poverty in South America hasn't changed because of Auschwitz, but Jews have. The real trouble, here in Kassel, in Atlanta and Toronto too, is that "Christians have trouble with Jewish power." That's the way my Atlanta contact puts it.

I have of course no objection to their worrying about South America, but I just have to tell them that Jews are not a symbol and that if they bring in Auschwitz, they have to mean it. There is a group of them, but I know there are several from whom I'll get support, very profound support.

That's a cheery note, and to conclude on another, if you fled the country in 1939 and came back here you wouldn't recognize it. Still, I'll be glad to get back to Jerusalem.

Watch for the wake up call



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

How many times has each and every one of us dug our head into some safe hole to avoid a problem, an unwanted challenge, something that had to be dealt with, but we didn't have the stomach to face it. And how many times has the inevitable "wake up" call rung. Whether we liked it or not, we then took action.

"Wake Up Call Avoidance" is a real talent of the current Netanyahu government. There have been no peace talks for three months. There has not been even a semi-serious effort to break the logjam imposed by this same government when it started to build the controversial suburb in East Jerusalem that it didn't even want. Violence has been limited to Hebron.

"Wake Up Call Avoidance" creates its own version of dementia, its own perverted logic. That logic raises ridiculous questions:

- There are no car bombs, no widespread violence. Why rush?
- Egypt and Jordan are not cutting off ties, they are not taking real action. So why give up something tangible?
- We don't like this peace process anyway. So, if they don't want to talk, why rush to negotiate?

But sooner or later reality will ring loudly in the prime minister's ear. It can come in many forms. Here are just a few examples:

Wake Up Call One: Widespread demonstrations lead to major clashes between Palestinian police and Israeli troops. The violence rages out of control. Israeli troops invade Palestinian cities. There are many casualties on both sides. Israel faces a guerrilla war in the West Bank and major terror strikes within the country.

Wake Up Call Two: Syria launches a limited invasion into the Golan Heights. Israeli troops repulse the attack but sustain several hundred casualties. The limited war further damages an Israeli economy plagued by uncertainty. While Syria loses the war, it wins the political battle. The Arab world rallies to Damascus' support. Jordan and Egypt withdraw their ambassadors to Israel.

Wake Up Call Three: Yasser Arafat is assassinated by Islamic extremist elements within the Palestinian camp. His successors take a much tougher line and are far more hesitant to risk bold measures for peace, fearing a similar fate. Escalating violence between Palestinians and Israelis replaces any chance of peace talks.

It would be far less costly to take action before the wake up call. But waking up from self-imposed stupor takes a lot of guts, maturity, strength and humility, qualities which are glaringly absent in Israel's leader.

Whether we like it or not, the wake up call will probably ring and then there will be frantic efforts to deal with the crisis. Naturally the blame will be conveniently placed on Israel's enemies and on certain scapegoat intelligence officials who failed to warn the government of the impending calamity.

From their very first meeting, as captured in this photo, the relationship between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Chairman Yasser Arafat has never been warm or trusting. At best, it has been strained and grudging. Many Israelis and Palestinians who worry about the implications arising from the stalemate in the peace process have expressed regret over the cold and untrusting nature of the relationship between the two leaders.

Who is a Jew?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The recent flap over the statement by Rabbi David Hollander, leader of a right-wing Orthodox rabbinical group that claims 500 members, is still having its reverberations. The rabbi called a press conference and announced his ruling and that of his colleagues: Reform and Conservative Judaism are not Judaism at all.

If that were so, and Conservative and Reform Jews are not following Judaism but another religion (or maybe religions), one is led to the inevitable conclusion that the adherents of these movements have checked out of Judaism and can no longer be considered Jews.

While more moderate Orthodox voices decried this statement, none was more forceful than that of Rabbi Norman Lamm, the president of Yeshiva University in New York. In an article in Forward, entitled Davvenu, he said: "While there are profound and logical differences between Orthodoxy in all its various manifestations, we are all part of the one Jewish people. 'Like one person, with one heart.'

"Hence, any assertion that non-Orthodox Jews are not to be considered as Jews is not only false but indefensible in both content and intent. Orthodox Judaism affirms that loyalty to Torah and the Halachah represents the sole authentic expression of the sacred Jewish tradition; it does not, however, in any way impugn the integrity of non-Orthodox Jews.

"It in no way questions the genuineness of the spiritual searching of those who sincerely are working their way in Judaism and have come to conclusions that may not be in consonance with Orthodox teachings. It in no way denies the democratic and human rights of any Jew to worship or not worship as they please.

"At the time of wholesale defection from Judaism, including conversion to other faiths, there are more important tasks for Jewish leadership than an injection of divisiveness into the dialogue amongst concerned Jews as to the future of our people.

"Jews should avoid unnecessary and unhelpful distractions. And the Jewish community should not attribute to Orthodox Jewry as a whole unwelcome and unwholesome rhetoric by a fringe group."

In further comment on this issue, Moshe Kohn (writing for the Jerusalem Post) reminds his readers of passages in the Shulchan Aruch: "All [Jewish] families are [ipso facto considered] halachically kosher [for marriage]... but if you are two families... or two individuals... constantly quarrelling... or a contentious arrogant individual, they [themselves] are suspect [as to their Jewish status] and one should keep one's distance from them, for these traits indicate that they may not be [kosher Jews].

"Furthermore, those who are constantly disqualifying others as mamzerim (children of forbidden unions and therefore not marriageable to halachically kosher Jews) are themselves under suspicion of being mamzerim... because people who are in the habit of disqualifying are only projecting their own defects to others."

If you would like to look up these passages, you will find them in Even Ha'ezer, Laws of Procreation 2:2.

The Kirshner File

Schiff fulfills an obligation to silenced voices

When Vera Schiff sat down to compose Theresienstadt: The Town the Nazis Gave the Jews (Lugus), she

By Sheldon Kirshner

instinctively understood why her book could serve a purpose.

"I write so that our children will continue to learn something of the Holocaust," writes Schiff, the mother of two sons who lost her entire family during the war.

"We, the vanishing survivors of Nazi concentration camps, have not always fulfilled our obligation toward the millions whose voices were silenced forever," she adds. "We should write down our personal stories as only we knew them."

And in Theresienstadt, an uncommonly well-written and sensitively-told memoir, Schiff — a Toronto native — leaves footprints in time.

This slim volume evokes her pampered childhood in Prague, her descent into purgatory, her struggle to survive against all odds, her new life in, and flight from, post-war Europe and finally, her arrival in Israel in the shadows of morning fog.

Born in May 1926, Schiff was the second and last daughter of a refined and fairly assimilated middle-class family which placed its trust in Czech democracy. The idyll was abruptly shattered in March 1939, when the German army marched into Czechoslovakia. "That was the day my adolescence ended," she observes.

Unable to emigrate, the Schiffs were deprived of their rights and their ability to earn a living. The situation went from bad to worse. On May 12, 1942, they were notified that they were to be deported to Theresienstadt. On that ignominious day, Schiff had her first taste of Nazi brutality, when an SS man punched her in the face.

Little did she know what awaited her in the camp itself. She was sexually assaulted by a seemingly kindly guard who had given her a sandwich. She was forced into a complicit act of euthanasia. She found her grandmother, barely breathing, under a pile of bodies. She watched her sister, Eva, die. Then, as if she had not been sufficiently punished, she witnessed the deaths of her parents, who succumbed to the ravages of malnutrition and disease within five months of each other in 1944.

The worst time of the day, she relates, was in the morning. "The moment I opened my eyes I became aware of the surroundings: the desolate barrack hall, the body odors... I used to close my eyes, hoping that all grimness would somehow vanish."

But for Schiff, life in Theresienstadt was not uniformly awful. Amid the deprivations, she was inducted into the joys of adolescent love. One of her boyfriends, Arthur, would become her husband.

Schiff does not believe she could have survived the rigors of Theresienstadt without the help of a prewar Christian neighbor, who supplemented her miserable rations, and of a Jewish doctor, who protected her from being sent to Auschwitz.

Theresienstadt is a book of unforgettable scenes, but one in particular lingers on, the visit of a group of naive inspectors from Denmark and the International Red Cross to the camp. "They never asked probing questions, never attempted to look around and walk in any direction but the one suggested by the German hosts," she writes bitterly. "They never wanted to see the reality of Theresienstadt. They wanted to leave with a clear conscience."

The Nazis made a film about the visit. Entitled The Leader Gave a Town to the Jews, it was directed by Kurt Gerron, a German Jew who perished in Auschwitz.

After being liberated, Schiff went back to Prague and resumed her studies. But she was desperately lonely and seemed incapable of returning to what passed for normality. A good many of her fellow survivors, she reports, renounced their faith "for the safe haven of belonging to a national majority."

Schiff, her husband and their infant son left Prague following the 1948 Communist coup. They were convinced, and rightly so, that freedom would be suppressed in Czechoslovakia. They lived in Nahariya for 12 years before immigrating to Canada, where Schiff worked in the health care field.

It took her four years to write Theresienstadt, she said in a brief interview. But, judging by the results, it was a worthwhile effort, especially for someone who arrived in Canada without a word of English.

Tolerance versus racism in Brazilian society

In Tel Aviv, a street is named after Oswaldo Aranha. He was the foreign minister of Brazil and the president of the United Nations' General Assembly.

This honor was conferred on Aranha because he actively supported the passage of a seminal UN resolution in 1947 calling for the partition of Palestine. Lest we forget, it paved the way for Israel's emergence as a sovereign state.

But was Aranha really pro-Jewish? In 1937, when fascism was riding high in Europe, the president of Brazil, Getulio Vargas, instructed the Foreign Ministry to issue a secret circular that banned the granting of visas to all persons of "Semitic origin." Aranha, one of his key advisors, backed the proposal. That he did so was symptomatic of the Brazilian elite's ambivalent attitude toward Jews during this period.

Jeffrey Lesser, a history professor at Connecticut College, examines this episode in Welcoming the Undesirables: Brazil and the Jewish Question (University of California Press, $18 US). Thoroughly researched, it is a fine, revealing book which exposes the tension between Brazil's image as a tolerant, multiracial society and its underlying racist impulses.

As Lesser observes, the Brazilian elite harbored mixed feelings about Jews. As "non-blacks," they were a privileged component of the social hierarchy. Yet Jews were considered culturally undesirable and carriers of Communism.

By the end of the 19th century, Brazil was home to several thousand Jews, many the descendants of Sephardi and East European immigrants. But Brazil had never been a magnet for Jewish immigration. Even as the 20th century dawned, few European Jews went to Brazil.

But as doors were closed to Jews in the 1920s and 1930s, an increasing number chose to settle in Brazil. In fact, Brazil became the third most important "receiving country" in the Americas after the United States and Argentina. By the early 1930s, 60,000 Jews lived in Brazil.

As a result of this influx and the onset of the Depression, Brazilian nativists targeted Jews. Influenced by events in Germany and Italy, Brazil began to deny visas to Jews beginning in 1935.

Two years later, Secret Circular 1,127 was issued by the Foreign Ministry, causing a 75 per cent drop in Jewish immigration over the next year. This was followed in 1938 by two new laws limiting the rights of foreigners. Zionism was thus banned and the Jewish National Fund's pushke — the metal collection box which nearly every Jewish household kept — was declared "illegal and dangerous."

Secret Circular 1,127 notwithstanding, the tide of Jewish immigration was not permanently stemmed. In 1939, more than 4,000 Jewish refugees entered Brazil, more than in any other year since 1929.

The marked increase, Lesser writes, was not indicative of a disappearance of anti-Jewish prejudice. Rather, it was a function of pressure exerted on Brazil by the United States and of the realization by certain Brazilian politicians that Jewish immigrants from Germany and Italy could be useful to a growing economy.

According to Lesser, almost 10,000 Jewish refugees slipped through the cracks this way. Nativists protested, and Jewish immigration all but dried up between 1942 and 1945. After World War II, however, it picked up again, underscoring Brazil's historically ambiguous policy toward Jewish immigration.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

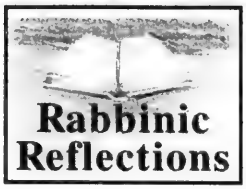
Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.



Rabbinic Reflections

Fulfilment of a chok is based on trust

By RABBI MICHAEL WOLFF

Jewish tradition has different names for different categories of law. One type of law is termed a chok. A chok, according to the commentary of Rashi and Rabbi Yitzchak Zvi Berliner, is a law given without a specific reason. One keeps the law, the chok, because G-d has commanded it. It is a law based on faith, done because we believe in the One who asked us to do it.

We read about the epitome of a chok in this week's Torah portion fittingly called Chukkat. The Torah portion starts with the words "Zot Chukkat Hatorah," this is the chok (the statute) of Torah. It then continues to explain the law of the red heifer, how the ashes of the red heifer can purify someone who is ritually impure as a result of being in contact with death.

This is evidently a law taken on faith, because one finds it hard to understand why the ashes of a red heifer can purify ritual impurity. It is not a logical, common sense sort of commandment. We have other chukim in the Torah: kashrut, the pascal lamb and the sabbatical year to name a few. All of these laws have an arbitrariness to them that is not logical.

What I find beautiful about the concept of a chok, is the whole notion of belief. I interpret belief to mean trust. We trust in something we cannot scientifically prove. We trust so much that we listen to the command, even if prima facie the command makes no sense to us. This notion of trust, of belief is the basis for good relationships.

Someone asked me recently what is the Jewish concept of unconditional love. I should have answered, although I did not, that the Jewish concept of unconditional love is the fulfilment of a chok. Unconditional love is to do an act because of trust, of faith in the one who asks us to do something. We care about that person so much, we will do what they ask without question.

This trust goes farther than obedience based on fear, because fear is a condition causing an action. Remove the fear and there is no obedience. Trust is a confidence in the other that everything will be all right. Trust is the love relationship where one has the confidence that one will not be abandoned, will not be let down.

Thomas Moore, a psychotherapist, writes in his book Care of the Soul (Harper Collins, 1992, p. 108) that an individual can often be defined in relation to another. Identity can be found through relationships.

Modern ethicists often talk about the right of autonomy and of individual independence. People seek their identity by expressing themselves, exclusive of relationships. It is an innate right.

I would posit, however, that one's Jewish identity is based on the chukim. It is based on the faith, the trust we have in G-d. Every individual establishes this relationship differently. Obviously, we are all different, because we are all individuals. But our identity does not exist in a vacuum. It exists in our relationships.

Diplomatically Speaking
By JEHUDI KINAR

Jewish education is key to continuity

Over the past two decades, the question of Jewish identity in North America has been a concern in the organized Jewish community. Now described as an issue of "Jewish continuity," this problem also exists in other Jewish communities, but it is particularly noticeable in North America because of the size of the Jewish community here.

While the "Jewishness" of Israeli society may sometimes be subject for debate, it is obvious that an Israeli child grows up surrounded by, and immersed in, Jewish culture. Israeli public schools teach their students Jewish history, culture and religious traditions.

At the same time, however, there is a whole generation of Jews abroad who have no personal memories of the Holocaust and during whose lifetime the State of Israel has always existed. For these people, Israel has no special significance. This generation is also very often removed from Jewish education and from Israel.

As Jews abroad become more distant from their own communities, so too do they have less and less in common with their contemporaries in Israel. In order to renew and reinforce the ties between Israel and the rest of the Jewish world, the centrality of Israel for Jewish life has to be indisputable. This can only happen by increasing the number of students who receive a Jewish education. Such education must also be more widely available to adults.

Need for continued financial support for Israel

Some Israeli political figures have suggested that Israel no longer needs financial support from Diaspora Jewry. They have suggested that the money sent to Israel could be better used for expanding Jewish education. Although I agree that more emphasis should be put on Jewish education, this does not pre-empt the need for continued financial support for Israel from the Diaspora.

I believe that the UJA/UIA would receive much less in donations were they not sending part of that money to Israel. With less funding, there would also be less money available for Jewish education. By making financial links, children of donors will feel a certain relationship with Israel. Most important of all, of course, are the many opportunities for young people of all ages to visit and spend time in Israel. Numerous studies have shown that such visits are crucial to cementing a strong relationship between Diaspora Jewry and Israel.

Children who grow up in families where there are no ties to or special relationship with Israel are less likely to develop an interest in that country. If Israel is not central in their lives, they will look for other outlets and will find them sometimes only in the general community (cultural life, financial world, sports). Their moving away from Israel, and ipso facto from Jewish life, endangers not only this natural relationship but Jewish continuity as a whole.

If we allow the distance between Diaspora Jewry and Israel to grow, it will become increasingly difficult to bridge the gap. For the sake of Jewish continuity in Israel and in the Diaspora, we must ensure that the links between our communities remain strong. I believe that education, for both children and adults, can play a crucial role in cementing not only Jewish identity in the Diaspora, but also the binding ties between Jews in the Diaspora and their counterparts in Israel.

Doctor provokes awe at wonder of life

The Wisdom of the Body*, by Sherwin Nuland (Knopf Publishing).

When Dr. Sherwin Nuland strolled leisurely into New Haven's Saint Raphael Hospital to begin his unhurried regular evening rounds, he was met with a startling message from an overhead speaker: "Go immediately to the operating room —immediately — any general surgeon!"

Rushing to the operating room, Nuland engaged in a desperate hand-to-hand combat with death. Expertly, his gown and clothing covered with blood, he managed to repair Marge Hansen's aneurysm of the splenic artery. Slowly he brought her from death's door to the joy and splendor of life renewed.

Recalling this and similar experiences, he writes, "Since the members of our species first became defined by our distinct genetic characteristics, we have called upon those reserves in as-yet-incomprehensible ways, in order to struggle against the looming threats that are everywhere the constant accompaniments to our existence on this planet. Marge Hansen was saved by that of the human spirit which was in her and in those OR personnel who refused to allow her life to end."

The author's earlier book How Do We Die? (1994), was an eloquent, thought provoking, realistic portrayal of the body's decline and the valiant efforts by doctors to postpone the inevitable. The Wisdom of the Body, on the other hand, is a paean to the miracle of life and a description of the astonishing body functions and structures that make it possible. In 12 lucid and lively chapters that are, in effect, mini-lectures on the anatomy and physiology, the challenged reader is informed about medical and scientific matters as diverse as the nature of cell biology, the process of reproduction and birth, cardio-vascular function and the technical and social aspects of heart transplants.

The serious, and sometimes involved, material is relieved by absorbing case histories which include the acute feelings and reactions of both doctor and patient. Nuland is a clinician filled with concern and compassion for his patients, and the reader joins him in spirit as he assists with the birth of his third child or when he informs a grateful, pregnant patient that she is in remission from an aggressive breast cancer.

Nuland is a splendid writer who brings arresting metaphor and imagination to his work. About the cell, he says, "At any given instant, in any given cell, millions of molecular interactions are taking place …The atmosphere of chaotic busyness is comparable to the cacophonous disorder of tumultuous factory whose every straining machine and shouting worker is situated in the same room, all united in the dynamism of furious, churning intensity that is required to guarantee, under circumstances of constant, instantaneous change, the stability of a single product. That product is life."

Where the promptings of sexual desire are concerned, he suggests that "sexual reproduction is apparently too direct for us — we have taken on this enormous bundle of baggage we call sexuality. The first small stirrings of sensual thought inevitably lead to an uproar of responses, taking us finally to regions of mental reconnaissance unknown to any other creature, and demanding choices that determine the pattern of an individual's life — and through him and millions like him, the pattern of a culture."

Surprisingly, Nuland speculates on the origin of our spiritual nature, which is not the product of the evolutionary process and which manifests itself in such attributes as altruism, the quest for beauty, compassion and sensibility. He concludes, agnostically, that God does not have to be involved. "The human spirit is…the generated product of our innate biology, encompassing the molecular behavior of our cellular structure. Nothing more need be sought. There is no need to invoke either a higher power or magic."

This is a rewarding book that leaves the reader, like the author, in awe of the wonders of the body and the glories of the human courage and endurance.

Web travel sites focus on Canada

If you're planning to travel a bit closer to home, you'll find Web sites for the major Jewish communities such as Montreal [http://inmtl.total.net/], Vancouver [http://www.interchg.ubc.ca/jfgv/] and Toronto's excellent Jewish Toronto Web site [http://www.feduja.org].

And while you're travelling through the large communities, don't forget about smaller ones like Regina and Saskatoon [http://www.gpfn.sk.ca/religion/judaism/]. Olam Katan — Small World — [http://www.ideasign.com/~olamkatan/] looks at such issues as meeting Jewish needs in a non-urban setting, finding kosher food and raising Jewish children in a rural setting.)

With all this travelling, you must be getting hungry. The Kosher Restaurant Database [http://www.shamash.org/kosher/krestquery. html] lists almost 1,000 kosher restaurants around the world. Care to dine at Tuscon's Oy Vey Cafe?

Thornhill teens finish second in chemistry contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — Two Thornhill teens have tied for second place in the Chem 13 News Examination, a chemistry contest sponsored by the University of Waterloo (UWO) and the University of Toronto.

Ryan Korda, 18, and Ryan Lindo, 17, OAC students at Vaughan Secondary School, each scored 37.5 out of a possible 40 marks, in the process qualifying for summer scholarships at the UWO. Over 4,400 students wrote the 40-question, multiple-choice exam.

Korda said he and his teacher are still debating one of the two questions he got wrong.

The hardest question, according to Korda, concerned the outcome of placing a piece of zinc in a copper nitrate solution, but in addition to testing purely scientific knowledge, the contest also included a few items relating to science history.

The two friends, with averages in the mid-90s, will return to high school next year for one last semester. This summer, Lindo will work as a day camp counsellor and Korda is planning to tutor Math.

Both Ryans are considering pursuing careers in medicine, although Korda, a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools, said after receiving the contest results, "Now, I think maybe I'll be a chemist."

Either way, he'll be following in the footsteps of his father, Andrew, a Toronto family physician who received a perfect score in province-wide departmental chemistry exams as a Grade 13 student at Bathurst Heights Secondary School in the 1960s.

"Ryan was always interested in nature and the sciences," said a proud Korda senior.

The two teens were among those recognized at a recent York Region Board of Education meeting for their contest results.

The students' teacher, Dr. Stavros Naxakis, was confident the pair would do well.

"He told us we'd get in the top five percent," recalled Lindo, who attended Associated prior to entering Brownridge Public School in Grade 3.

"He really pushed and coached us," added Korda. "He positively reinforced us."

Naxakis, the school's assistant head of science, offered extra lessons to all interested students before the contest. The sessions were particularly helpful to students like Korda, who had not yet completed OAC Chemistry. For Lindo, who took the course in first semester, Naxakis' lessons served as a refresher course.

"They're very intelligent students, and they were very motivated to win," Naxakis said of Korda and Lindo.

The latter, who not only plays guitar and sings in a rock band but also finished first in his school in OAC biology, is a "multi-talented person [who] does well in everything," said Naxakis.

Korda, he declared, "is an amazing student. He wants to understand everything."

UJA mission back from Baku

TORONTO — A delegation of 40 Canadians recently caught a glimpse of life in one of the former Soviet Union's oldest Jewish communities, in the small village of Kuba.

On a recent visit to Azerbaijan, the Canadians were in Baku to participate in the Jewish Agency's June assembly, along with hundreds of other English-speaking delegates from around the world. Other international Jewish Agency delegates met in Kiev, Odessa, Tbilisi and Minsk.

Although most of Azerbaijan's 25,000 Jews live in the eastern city of Baku, some 5,000 Persian-speaking Jews, known as Mountain Jews, reside in Kuba, the oldest Jewish community in the area.

"The Jews of Kuba live as self-sufficiently today as they did in the 13th century," said past UJA Federation campaign chair David Goldstein. "It was absolutely fascinating to behold Jewish life in such a remote and isolated place."

In Baku, the Canadian delegation visited a Jewish Agency-run summer camp and an ulpan where young students learn Hebrew in preparation for aliyah to Israel. They met with leaders of the local Jewish community, toured Baku's old city, including a centuries-old synagogue, and met with Jewish parents who sent their children to study on Jewish Agency programs in Israel.

UJA Federation campaign vice-chair David Engel and the Jewish Agency's representative in Kuba, Azerbaijan, visit with some of the Jewish community's youngest members.

Since 1989, the Jewish Agency has brought close to 30,000 Jews from Azerbaijan to Israel.

"Witnessing firsthand the commitment of the Jewish Agency workers to the Jews remaining in the former Soviet Union was tremendously gratifying," Goldstein said. "You can see the difference they're making in the faces of the children."

In Israel, participants met new immigrants at a Jewish Agency absorption centre, visited UJA Federation funded Partnership 2000 urban renewal projects and took part in an open meeting of the Jewish Agency's Board of Governors strategic planning committee.

Stroke Recovery Group members celebrate life

By SIMONE JOSEPH
Student Intern

TORONTO — Close to 100 people dined, danced and did the hokey pokey recently at the seventh annual dinner of the Bathurst Jewish Centre's (BJC) Stroke Recovery Group.

Several members of the group, who had not been participating in the group's regular exercise classes because of poor health, attended the banquet at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"They were away for months, but they made a special effort to be here tonight," says group coordinator Irene Lastman.

The stroke recovery group began around 1980, says Lastman. At that time, the group participated mainly in exercise activities. Then, seven years ago, Lastman introduced entertainment and socialization.

After having a stroke, many people think their social life is over, Lastman says. Many members attend the group because a doctor or child advised them to, but then they often find out that they enjoy participating in the group.

They discover there's "still something to laugh and sing about. You'd be surprised the enjoyment and pleasure they [derive] from the group," she says.

About six years ago, a woman whose husband had recently suffered a stroke told Lastman that her family was having a simchah and her husband was reluctant to attend, because he was having trouble eating, he was unable to walk or dance, he was embarrassed about being in a wheelchair and he felt that the social part of his life was over. The woman asked Lastman for advice.

Lastman invited the couple to one of the group's annual dinners and she says the man's wife was "crying tears of joy" when she saw her husband dancing with the help of a volunteer.

"That is the first time I've seen him get up, dance and smile since he had the stroke," the woman later told Lastman. The woman's husband did eventually attend the family's simchah.

Lastman herself suffered a stroke 15 years ago.

"Whenever there was an outing, I was embarrassed to go out, but I found out [it's] important to participate in social activities," she says.

Often, people who have suffered a stroke are embarrassed to be seen in public.

"It doesn't disturb me that someone has to eat with one hand and have someone cut food for them. [But] many of these people have very limited social lives," says Don Colt, a member of the group for over 10 years.

Colt also says that frequently, people in the general public feel embarrassed in the company of someone who has suffered from a stroke.

"A lot of people feel uncomfortable with people who are disabled, maybe because it [reminds them of] their own vulnerability," he says.

Colt suffered a stroke in 1984, resulting in his arm, leg and face being paralyzed. He says that the group greatly assisted him in recovering.

"Now I have a near-normal life in terms of physical rehabilitation, social development and social skills. It's helped me [in] terms of having a positive mental attitude," he says.

A question many stroke recovery people face after they return home, is what can they do to keep stimulated? The BJC's stroke recovery group offers exercise classes, "coffee time," bingo, gambling, swimming and outings, in addition to the dinner.

"The companionship keeps you interested. It's too easy after you've had a stroke to stay home and watch TV. It's hard to stay stimulated...[Being part of the group] means you have to get up and get out of the house," says Bill Mahon, a four-year member of the group who suffered a stroke in 1992.

Each year, group members look forward to the annual dinner, says volunteer Ben Swartz.

"They're sort of locked in their houses...You can see how exuberant they are. They love getting out to any event we have...doing something normal other than being locked in their wheelchair in their house," he says.

At this year's dinner, the group was entertained by a live band and surprise guests Louis Danto (Beth Emeth's cantor) and accompanist Charles Heller (director of the synagogue's choir).

Suzanne Agasee, a former volunteer for the group, got members involved in doing the hokey pokey.

The night ended with the dancing of the horah. Lastman says at least four people have already made reservations for next year's banquet.

JCS creates opportunities for present, future interns

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a summer intern at Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, economics student Eric Malka, 19, is working to create opportunities for other university students to work as interns.

He and Ari Shapiro, 22, JCS' other summer intern, are working on a total of four projects: the creation of a membership card that would offer benefits such as retail discounts, a formal career mentoring project, an orientation day "partner fair" to run at local campuses (to introduce students to various ways of becoming involved Jewishly), and a database of alumni of Hillel and other local Jewish campus groups .

Shapiro, a recent graduate of Ryerson Polytechnic University's Business Management program who is working on the latter two projects, has been scouring archival documents, including old convocation programs and back issues of The CJN, in search of former students. Old copies of Torontonensis, a U of T yearbook last published in 1966, have yielded names of some students who were involved with B'nai Brith Hillel, as it used to be known.

In compiling the list of alumni, JCS is "laying down serious foundations that hopefully will benefit future students," said JCS director Zac Kaye.

Eric Malka

Ari Shapiro

So far there are about 200 names from the University of Toronto and a quarter as many from York University, said Shapiro. When interviewed last week, he was about to make inquiries about his own alma mater, where he served as president of Ryerson Hillel and to which he will return this fall for further study.

It is expected the project will tie in with the mentoring program on which Malka is working.

With advice from Jewish Vocational Service, which runs a similar program for immigrants, Malka is putting in place some of the elements necessary for a successful student mentoring program. The program received a continuity grant from UJA Federation.

Shapiro said he "would have appreciated" a co-op program at Ryerson.

It is hoped that students will gain useful experience and find career direction by participating in the JCS mentoring program once it is set up, said Malka.

Perhaps some of the alumni will be able to mentor current students, the interns suggested. Shapiro expects the "established" alumni will be in a position to share "time, effort and resources" with today's students.

For Malka and Shapiro, both graduates of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, this year marks the first time they are not working at a summer camp.

"It's a serious job," said Malka, who didn't realize at first how much responsibility he would have. When a friend told him JCS was seeking a summer student, he expected the work would involve more routine office tasks.

'It's a great experience'

"It's a great experience," he said. He hopes that the students who benefit from his work this summer will likewise reap something of value from the mentoring program.

His other project (the JCS membership card) is not exactly a new idea to him, although charging a membership fee is a first in Toronto.

At the University of Western Ontario, where Malka spent his first year (he is transferring to York University), he received a membership card when he paid to join Western's Jewish Student Union.

The Toronto version would set students back a nominal amount (likely $10 to $12) and would offer discounts at JCS events, kosher restaurants and retail outlets in the Toronto area.

As marketing and membership coordinator, Malka is contacting local businesspeople to request their involvement.

"It's a win-win situation," said Kaye of Malka and Shapiro's 13-week tenure at JCS, made possible by the federal government's summer jobs program. "It helps the students and it helps us."

Jewish campus professionals take part in new Hillel program

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — Forty North American Jewish campus professionals — including three from Canada, Yakov Feig from Halifax, Gabriel Meranda from London and Allysia Horowitz from Edmonton — recently participated in a new program organized by Hillel in Israel.

The aim of the three-week session was to strengthen Jewish identity through different Israel experiences and professional development, so that the participants could bring back new ideas to the students at the various campuses in Canada and the United States.

The professionals attended different programs offered to students —they studied at Pardes, Aish HaTorah, Hebrew University, Hebrew Union College and the Jewish Theological Seminary.

They also explored student programs, attended seminars on topics related to Jewish identity, professional development and problems on campus, and learned different ways of teaching about Israel and the Holocaust on campus.

Yakov Feig

"You realize every student you send to Israel needs an experience tailored to his/her needs," said Feig, the programmer responsible for the largest geographical area of students in Canada. "Now that I've participated in some of these programs and have got a feel for what they're about, I can better help design a program for each student."

He said he also picked up programs that are successful on other campuses and he will try to implement some of them this September on the various campuses in the Maritimes.

"I'd like to try the Beit Midrash style of learning, in chavrutahs," he said. "It's a one-on-one style of learning that we could integrate into our weekly Torah sessions."

The group also met with Israeli speakers and politicians including Anat Hoffman, who spoke about feminist issues in Israel, Labor MK Yossi Beilin, Rabbi Riskin from the Efrat community on the other side of the Green line, and Avrum Burg.

"The conference was definitely worth it," Feig said. "Where else can I get professional development in a place that's inspiring?"

The group developed the idea of a program exchange whereby they have made a list of people who are experts in a certain area. For example, there are six professional experts on teaching about the Holocaust who can help other professionals design programs for their areas.

This conference also showed the differences between campuses.

"There seems to be a bigger sense of community on the Canadian campuses," Feig said. While there are some religious differences, "there's a stronger sense of togetherness in Canada, whereas the Americans are really into pluralism issues."

Because the Hillel conference was such a success this year, it will take place in Israel again next year.

Closing arguments made in Collins case

By BAILA LAZARUS
Western Jewish Bulletin

VANCOUVER — Doug Collins' writing should be considered harmful, not merely offensive, because it vilifies members of a group on the basis of their religion, a British Columbia human rights tribunal heard in closing arguments.

Gregory Walsh, legal counsel for the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), reiterated its position that a column by North Shore News columnist Doug Collins should be considered hate speech and a violation of the British Columbia Human Rights Act.

Complainants, respondents and interveners in the case submitted final arguments June 23 to 27.

CJC launched a complaint with the B.C. Council of Human Rights against Collins because of a column he wrote in March, 1994.

In the piece, Collins maintained that the experience of Jews during the Holocaust is "the most effective propaganda exercise ever," referred to the film Schindler's List as "Swindler's List" and said the figure of six million Jews killed during the Holocaust was "nonsense." CJC is asking for a cease and desist order against the columnist.

The North Shore News, represented by David Sutherland, dismissed Congress's argument that the column is likely to expose Jews to hatred or contempt. He added that freedom of expression, guaranteed by the Canadian constitution, allows such opinion pieces to be published without legal repercussions.

Walsh argued that, although freedom of speech is guaranteed by the Canadian constitution, the right has no supremacy over other rights which are also guaranteed.

"This case is important because it engages all of our fundamental rights; not just free speech," he said. "It goes to the values that underlie all the rights stated in the constitution — the right of the individual to dignity and self worth, to freedom of religion, to equality, to a peaceful coexistence and to a multicultural society."

Roger McConchie, counsel for the B.C. Press Council, maintained that freedom of expression, according to the press and other media, has historically been seen as paramount over other freedoms.

McConchie added that the cease and desist order requested by CJC is irrelevant for newspapers, because newspapers do not print the same articles every day.

"Collins does not write, day after day, the Schindler's List column," said McConchie. "The complaint is about one column that came out years ago and mentioned Schindler's List which is probably on video by now.

"You're not talking about a situation where you can stop something that is ongoing," McConchie continued. "Columnists will be dead if they don't publish new, timely columns day after day."

Walsh stressed that the social context of the column had to be looked at closely when considering whether Collins' column is "likely to expose" Jews to hatred or contempt.

"Jewish people are the targets of hate literature. They have been for ages," Walsh said. He added that this makes Jews more susceptible to the ill sentiments of other. "Any article that stereotypes people according to their religion, and then vilifies all Jews as being dishonest, untrustworthy, motivated by greed and money runs afoul of section 2(1)(b) period."

In a surprise submission, Sutherland suggested that expert testimony that explained how the column opened Jews up to hatred and contempt, should be ignored. Calling the interpretations "argument" and not "evidence," Sutherland said it is very important for newspapers to have a clear line drawn so that they are aware of what published material might violate the B.C. Human Rights Act in the future.

In order to do this, he suggested, the testimony from expert witnesses should be disregarded and the decision objectively determined by the adjudicator of the hearing.

Ultimately, Sutherland claimed, it is going to be people of "ordinary intelligence" who have to determine whether an article that a newspaper is about to publish contravenes the B.C. Human Rights Act and it would not be practical if such people needed "PhDs from another city" to make their decision.

Adjudicator Nitka Iyer called his suggestion a "serious submission" but did not indicate if she would follow his advice.

"In this proceeding I am only concerned with the constitutional validity of [section 2(1)(b)] of the B.C. Human Rights [Act] and the merits of this case," she said. "In other words, I am not concerned with the law the way it ought to be, but the way it is constitutionally required to be.

"In the end, the way I must write my decision and the way I must come to my decision is not as a human being or as a member of this society. My job is to apply the law as I understand it guided by submissions of council."

Iyer is expected to take several months in coming to her decision about the hearing.

Relevant legislation

The central question before the human rights tribunal is whether Doug Collins' column, Hollywood Propaganda, contravenes section 2(1)(b) of the B.C. Human Rights Act and whether section 2(1)(b) is constitutionally valid under section 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Section 2(1)(b) of the Human Rights Act states, "No person shall publish, issue or display or cause to be published, issued or displayed any statement, publication, notice, sign, symbol, emblem or other representations that. . . is likely to expose a person or group or class of persons to hatred or contempt because of race, color, ancestry, place of origin, religion, marital status, family status, physical or mental disability, sex, sexual orientation or age of that person or that group or class of persons."

Section 2(2) states, "Subsection (1) does not apply to a private communication or to a communication intended to be private."

Section 2(b) of the Charter states, "Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms: freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication."

NELSON, B.C. — The Kootenay Jewish Cultural Association (KJCA), which represents the approximately 70 to 100 Jews who live in the eastern British Columbia region known as the Kootenays, are in the process of applying for status as a legal non-profit society.

The issue was discussed at a recent meeting of the KJCA that attracted 30 to 40 people.

According to to Carol Erickson, who is completing the application (and who along with another local resident, Eileen Bell, placed an ad in a local paper to inform residents of the meeting), the KJCA is an informal group but wants to get offical status "so that we can form an authority to perform marriages and other ceremonies."

Erickson, who came to Nelson from Chicago with her husband 25 years ago, noted that the KJCA also wants to raise money to bring a rabbi to Nelson for the High Holy Days.

Other issues discussed at the meeting included forming Jewish study groups to study Jewish texts and to learn Hebrew (one such group has already been formed); bringing in speakers to lecture on Jewish topics; and celebrating Jewish culture through film, dance and song.

Hamilton mayor honored at JNF dinner

By MOURA WOLPERT
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Mayor Robert M. Morrow was recently honored at the Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner here.

Over 400 guests paid tribute to Morrow, Hamilton's longest serving mayor, who was praised for his leadership and dedication to the progress and well-being of the city and its citizens.

The guest speaker was New York City's former mayor, Ed Koch, who gave an entertaining account of some of the trials and tribulations of his years as mayor of the Big Apple.

He engaged in some banter with Morrow and with North York Mayor Mel Lastman, who had introduced Koch, comparing notes and observing that whereas in the United States, "we honor our mayors, in Canada you worship them."

On a more serious note, Koch spoke of the importance of Israel to all Jews and the need to support the JNF's current Negev development project to provide land for all the Jews "who need [to come to Israel.] The day will come," he predicted, "when all remaining Jews will want to leave Russia."

Among those who brought greetings were JNF regional chair, Terry Cooke; Tony Valeri, MP for Stoney Creek on behalf of the federal government; Cam Jackson, MPP for Burlington, minister without portfolio responsible for seniors, on behalf of Premier Mike Harris; and Hamilton federation president, Judge George Czutrin. Hamilton West MP Stan Keyes was represented by his wife Cathy.

Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar expressed hope that Morrow would attend next year's mayors' conference in Israel during the country's 50th anniversary year.

On behalf of JNF Canada, board member Dr. Sharon Hart, past president of Hamilton JNF, spoke about the work of JNF, in particular about Action Plan Negev, the project for which the proceeds of the dinner have been designated.

Following the presentation of a brief video of Bob Morrow in Israel with the JNF Mega Tour of 1992, the mayor recalled some of the highlights of his trip and spoke of what the visit had meant to him.

Participants experience a 'spiritual high' at Havurah Shabbaton

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — A new movement is making its way from south of the border to the Canadian Jewish scene with an energetic and creative approach to Judaism.

The newly formed National Havurah Community of Canada (NHCC) and its parent organization, the National Havurah Committee, recently held the sixth annual Canadian/American Havurah Shabbaton on Canadian soil for the first time.

One-hundred and twenty participants of all ages from various American and Canadian cities gathered at the Canterbury Hills Retreat Centre in Hamilton for a weekend of study, Jewish renewal and spiritual growth.

The weekend featured Havurah-style worship and study, characterized by singing and dancing, mixed with an assortment of workshops on Jewish prayer, mysticism and storytelling.

According to NHCC president Dr. David Weiss, the Havurah movement began at a grassroots level in the early '70s, its founders sharing a feeling of alienation from formalized religion and a desire for meaningful spiritual experiences.

Some parallels with Chassidism can be found in the attempts by both movements to create a spiritual atmosphere through the chanting of niggunim, singing and dancing. Weiss says, however, that most chassidic groups place emphasis on the rebbe as a mediator, whereas the Havurah movement eschews the notion of one charismatic leader, embracing the concept of shared leadership. Full gender equality and an emphasis on inclusiveness and tolerance of varied expressions of Jewishness are other points of departure, he adds.

"What we intend is to use as many entry points as possible, so that everybody will have the chance to feel they've been spoken to. Some people can be reached through intellectual discussion. Some can be reached through dancing and movement, others through English readings or poetry. Other people will just feel connected through singing songs. The whole purpose is to connect."

Although participants came to the Shabbaton from a variety of backgrounds, there were several common perceptions. Many spoke about the spiritual highs they experienced and were skeptical that a similar experience could be found in their local synagogues. Others were impressed by the friendliness of the people, the warm and inclusive atmosphere and how welcome they were made to feel by veteran participants. Most said that in between national Havurah events they are hard pressed to find a similar experience in their own communities.

Weiss hopes that the NHCC will raise the profile of the Havurah movement through its focus on organizing local events, including the annual Canadian/American Shabbatons, Friday night pot luck services, study sessions and social events in the Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa areas. The committee will also provide advice and counsel for groups wishing to begin havurot, particularly in smaller centres, as well as promoting international Havurah events, such as the National Havurah Committee's week-long annual Summer Institute.

Architecture team unveils proposal for Auschwitz

WATERLOO, Ont. — A proposal to reconstruct the state museum at the site of Auschwitz-Birkenau, in existence since the late 1940s, was unveiled recently by a research team involving architecture faculty, students and alumni from the University of Waterloo (UW) and Clark University in Worcester, Md.

The reconstructed state museum would commemorate the deaths of more than 100,000 Poles and over one million Jews at the Nazi concentration camps of Auschwitz and Birkenau.

Recently, UW cultural history and architecture professor Robert Jan van Pelt and Prof. Deborah Dwork, who teaches Holocaust history at Clark University, presented the proposal to Poland's president, Aleksander Kwasniewski, senior government officials, provincial authorities and local authorities in Oswiecim (Auschwitz), among others.

At the meeting, a tentative agreement was reached to jointly develop a master plan for the future of Auschwitz by December 1998.

The strategy proposal was developed by professors, students and alumni of UW's School of Architecture in conjunction with the Centre for Holocaust Study at Clark University.

The UW-Clark proposal was commissioned by Miles Lerman, chair of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council.

Unconventional bar mitzvah in B.C.

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

NELSON, B.C. — A rather unconventional bar mitzvah was recently held in the Kootenay region.

The bar mitzvah was not held in a synagogue, nor was there a rabbi present at the ceremony.

Thomas Bell, the bar mitzvah boy, read a Torah portion in English before a small gathering of friends and family. The Torah was provided by a local resident who helped him find the Torah portion that was closest to his birthday. Blessings were made, challahs were consumed and guests were invited to read stories from their own past about Jewish tradition. Jews and non-Jews alike helped welcome this new Jewish adult into their community.

According to Eileen Bell, Thomas' mother and a former resident of Montreal (whose family still lives in Montreal), "it's very challenging trying to deal with bnei mitzvah in Nelson. Some people just don't do much about it."

But she said that her son wanted to somehow mark the occasion and so she had given a lot of thought to finding a way of commemorating the day, given the limited resources that exist in the Nelson Jewish community.

Nelson has no synagogue, congregation or rabbi and the Kootenay Jewish Cultural Assocation (KJCA), which is the only Jewish organization in the region, is an informal assocation of Jews which has limited resources to facilitate events like bnei mitzvah.

In fact, in order to have a more conventional bar mitzvah, members of the Kootenay Jewish community must travel to Spokane, Wash., or Kelowna. (Each is a three-hour drive from Nelson.) One member of the community has even decided to have her son's upcoming bar mitzvah in Vancouver, which is an eight-hour drive fron Nelson.

Association gives 'hand-up' help

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Western Bulletin

VANCOUVER — The Hebrew Assistance Association (HAA) reached a milestone recently when it received its 1,000th application.

The benevolent organization, which gives interest-free loans of up to $4,000 to members of the Jewish community, is also celebrating a record $500,000 in assets.

"It's a measure of what we do," said Shirley Barnett, a founder of the current 18-year-old association. The philosophy behind the loans is that it's more constructive to give a 'hand up' rather than a 'hand out' and it's a more dignified way of helping people without compromising their self-esteem.

The HAA provides loans for everything from emergency relief to the purchase of a car or computer in order to help with work. It has approved 650 loans since its inception and has given out 81 loans this year, already surpassing the 80 given out in all of 1996. That brings the total outstanding loans to 217 with an average balance of under $2,000.

The applicant who was number 1,000 is a new immigrant who needs to purchase a car to get to work.

Mannie Druker, president of the loan organization, takes pride in the HAA's accomplishments and underlines the fact it has a bad debt rate of only one per cent. He also points out an ever-growing membership of more than 300 who support the agency through donations and membership fees.

He thinks one of the reasons for the HAA's success is the enjoyment board members and other volunteers get from participating in even the day-to-day operations.

"Nobody wants to get off the board," Mr. Druker said. "The big thing is that it's a volunteer board and we have quite a few people on the board who really enjoy this and who find it satisfying work."

He added that one of the HAA's strengths is its independence. Unlike loan associations in other communities, which are associated with their local Jewish federations, the agency here has no ties. "It's non bureaucratic," said Druker. "There's no politics involved."

But, as successful as the organization is, Druker would like to see HAA reach even more people. "One of the big challenges we have is that the people coming from the former Soviet Union have a remarkable network and they know how to find us," he said.

"But we believe there are others who have either lived here a long time or who were born in Canada, who just don't get to us. Our job is to find those people who could really use our help."

Seniors hear advice on longevity

By MOURA WOLPERT
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — If we do all the right things such as eating properly, exercising, keeping active and not smoking, chances are we can live years beyond our biological potential says the vice-president of medicine at Toronto's Baycrest Hospital.

Dr. Michael Gordon spoke recently to Shalom Village residents and staff recently at the Shalom Village Founders' Lecture at Adas Israel Synagogue.

The occasion was also in honor of founding executive director Sheila Burman, who retired a year ago but returned to head the current Shalom Village $1.5-million building fund campaign.

Gordon talked about the impact of longevity on the health-care system, changing family structures, new work situations and pension reforms, noting these changes will mean "our responsibilities will have to be reviewed."

He called Shalom Village "very innovative," and Baycrest, he announced, would "adopt some ideas for the new home we're planning to build soon."

Advances in medicine and health care, he observed, have led to people remaining independent longer and needing institutional care at an older age.

He cautioned against expensive medications and surgical treatments to repair the ravages of old age, advising proper care instead. "We have a fetish in this age about how we look."

He also warned of the dangers of taking too many drugs. "It is very, very important," he said, "to check all medications with your doctor periodically to see whether you still need them.

"What we can now look forward to is not a walker, but riding into the sunset on our 10-speed bikes!"

Shalom Village president Leslie Lasky opened the program with a brief talk about the facility and a tribute to Burman, presenting her and her husband David with a brick mounted on wood, "...for making our dream a reality, brick by brick."

Burman then announced the building fund campaign has reached $1.3 million.

Report slams military

ities, or even excluding active racists from United Nations duties.

"The Canadian Forces lacked — and continues to lack — any procedure apart from the normal chain of command, for complaining about racist conduct."

The report found that by June 1992, the defence department's special investigations unit (SIU) identified 40 soldiers as possibly involved in racist organizations. Six of the 40 were members of the Airborne regiment.

Cpl Matt McKay of CAR's 2 commando had been photographed in 1991 in his Winnipeg barracks giving the Nazi salute. Another member of the Armed Forces attended skinhead rallies and was linked to the violent Aryan Resistance Movement.

The report also noted that after the CAR was deployed to Somalia, the SIU became aware of five other racists including Cpl.Clayton Matchee and Pte. Kyle Brown. Matchee was the soldier who tortured and killed Arone. Matchee suffered permanent brain damage when he attempted to hang himself after he was charged. Brown participated in the assault on Arone.

The report found "a persistent problem of racist behavior among some CAR members" despite a zero-tolerance policy at the Armed Forces' Petawawa base.

"Racial slurs were uttered without any disciplinary response. In September 1991, a Nazi flag and paraphernalia were found hanging on the wall in a 2 Commando barracks used for orders group meetings...Racist conduct and association with racist groups were not a factor in pre-deployment screening by units at the time of the Somalia deployment. The SIU was not asked to provide input on the screening of personnel for overseas missions."

The report found that "racism was recognized by the military as a significant issue only after media reports in the spring of 1993." That led to the development of a policy on racism and the issuing of administrative guidelines that prohibits racist conduct on penalty of possible dismissal.

The commission recommended:
• Development of guidelines to commanders regarding prohibited racist and extremist conduct;
• Monitoring involvement and affiliation of soldiers in racist groups;
• The Canadian Forces and the defence department establish regular liaison with anti-racist groups to obtain assistance in the conduct of appropriate cultural sensitivity training and to assist commanders in identifying signs of racism and involvement in hate groups.

While applauding the report, Landy and spokespersons for B'nai Brith were concerned the government will shelve its recommendations.

"We fear the issues of entrenched racism will be ignored," said Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. "This is a unique opportunity for the government to implement race relations policies.

Marvin Kurz, the League's legal counsel, said "we are profoundly disappointed with the government for its response, both to the commissioners and the process of inquiry. The government sought to undermine the inquiry through its existence, has never fully supported their work and continues to act in that vein."

Elaine McArdle, a spokesperson for Eggleton's office, said the Department of National Defence has had an anti-racist policy since 1993. Thirty-five percent of the members of the Armed Forces have taken an anti-racism course under the Standard for Harassment and Racism Prevention (SHARP) policy, she said.

Federal authorities allege Maciukas, who lives in St. Leonard, Que., north of Montreal, participated in atrocities against civilians in Lithuania and Byelorussia. They claim he failed to divulge his service in the unit as well as his recruitment into the German armed forces in 1944.

The 12th Battalion was a killing unit established by the Lithuanian policethat murdered about 50,000 Jews in Byelorussia.

Three years ago, former Justice Minister Allan Rock promised legal action would be brought against 12 alleged Nazi war criminals. Maciukas is the last of the 12 to be named. Two of the men, Antanas Kenstavicius and Josef Nemsila, died in the early stages of their cases. Kisielaitis is not one of the 12 men already named.

In other developments, Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said lawyers in the unit believe Canada is not in a position to requests the extradition of former Cambodian strongman Pol Pot.

Under the war crimes section in the Criminal Code, suspects must have some connection to Canada before they can be charged. Without that connection, there is no provision for requesting his extradition, he said.

Canada would obtain that jurisdiction if Pol Pot were to arrive in Canada, Vickery added.

Canada had been asked by U.S. officials to consider bringing Pol Pot, believed responsible for the murder of up to two million Cambodians, to trial in Canada.

IDF officer killed in clash with Hezbollah

Reportedly hit in first burst of fire and later died of his wounds

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An IDF officer was killed in a clash with Hezbollah gunmen in the northeastern sector of the security zone last Sunday, during a day of heavy fighting in south Lebanon.

There were reports of either mortar shells or Katyusha rockets falling close to the northern border in the western region of the zone last night. It was not clear if any fell in Israeli territory.

Maj. Nadav Milo, 24, of Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu in the Beit She'an Valley, was buried in the kibbutz cemetery last Monday.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, recalling having once spoken with Milo, told a workers' meeting in Bat Yam last night: "We have lost an outstanding officer who ...would have had a great future. I am full of admiration for the commanders and soldiers who are carrying out important and demanding operations in Lebanon against Hezbollah, which is supported by Iran.

"I am seeking and will continue to seek every course that might even partially improve the situation in Lebanon," Mordechai said. "I will make every effort on this matter, and believe me, I have no illusions and I don't care if I'm attacked for this. I have a deep feeling of commitment to the soldiers in Lebanon...and I am duty bound as defence minister to search for any possible solution."

Milo, commander of a paratroop brigade engineers company, was leading a unit on patrol in the Soujud region when they came under close-range fire.

It was not clear whether the Hezbollah squad, apparently composed of three or four gunmen, was laying in ambush or happened to be in the area and spotted the paratroopers first and opened fire.

Milo was reportedly hit in the first burst of fire and later died of his wounds. According to initial inquiries, the rest of the unit returned fire, forcing the gunmen to retreat and thereby preventing further casualties.

The gunmen, however, received support and covering fire from Hezbollah mortar crews north of the zone. The mortars were directed at the troops in the field and the nearby Soujud outpost.

The clash prompted heavy exchanges, with IDF and South Lebanese Army gunners blasting Hezbollah positions north of the zone and especially in the Iqlim al-Toufah region.

IAF warplanes and helicopter gunships also carried out a number of sorties against Hezbollah positions in the Jabal Shaffi area.

An IDF spokesperson said the pilots reported accurate hits on their targets and that all the aircraft returned safely.

Reports from Lebanon said the planes and helicopter gunships carried out as many as 14 separate attacks during the day. There were no immediate reports of any casualties.

According to reports, Hezbollah claimed it had fired an anti-aircraft missile at the planes and helicopters, although there was no confirmation of this from other sources.

The air raids and the heavy shelling were apparently aimed at silencing Hezbollah's mortar fire. Some reports said as many as 20 to 30 gunmen were involved in giving covering fire to the squad in the field.

Reports from Lebanon said three Lebanese civilians, a 7-year-old boy and a man in Jarjoua village, and another in nearby Ein Baswar, were wounded by the IDF shelling.

Security sources in Israel stressed that the IDF has no desire or intention of harming innocent civilians or deliberately shelling villages. Nevertheless, the sources noted that Hezbollah had again used villages north of the zone as cover for its mortar crews.

OC Northern Command Maj. Gen. Amiram Levine warned that the IDF and SLA would return fire in self-defence if Hezbollah continued this practice and that in such circumstances the organization would be responsible for bringing the war into the villages.

The sources noted that Hezbollah had suffered heavy losses recently, with at least six gunmen known to have been killed by IDF troops in the past week.

It was perhaps for that reason that the organization released a videotape last Sunday of its fighters operating in the northeastern sector of south Lebanon, although analysts said it appeared the video had been filmed earlier.

The IDF and SLA had been on full alert for Hezbollah reprisals, although it appears that the troops involved in the clash last Sunday were taken by surprise.

Personal security better under this gov't – poll

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — Support for the government's more hard-line policies has dropped since last year, but the public is less fearful of war breaking out, and feels more personally secure, according to a survey conducted on behalf of Tel Aviv University's Tami Steinmetz Centre.

Moreover, continued building in the territories has many more supporters than opponents. Even among those who believe that war might break out if the political deadlock continues, those supporting settlement construction still exceed those who are opposed.

The survey was conducted by Modi'in Ezrahi on June 30, and was comprised of telephone interviews with 505 Jewish adults. The margin of error is about four percent.

Asked as to the chance of war with the Arabs breaking out before long if the peace process remained deadlocked, 32 percent felt that the chance is slight or very slight. Last June, only 21.9 percent felt that confident.

Asked "do you support or oppose a tougher policy by the Israeli government in negotiations with the Palestinians," 56.4 percent supported such a policy and 35.5 percent were opposed. In June 1996, 70.7 percent supported a tougher policy while 18.2 percent opposed it.

Meanwhile, 41.5 percent felt that their own personal security is better than it was under the last government. Last June, only 28.9 percent felt more secure than under the previous government. A similar trend can also be discerned in appraisals of the national security situation: 30.6 percent believe this situation to be better than it was under the last government, whereas one year ago only 21.3 percent felt this way.

The respondents were asked the following: "The Palestinians claim that building in the settlements is the principal factor in the deadlock of negotiations with Israel. What should the Israeli government do?" The results: 40.8 percent replied that it must stop building, but 52.6 percent believe that the building program should continue as planned.

The support for continuing to build, as compared with halting the building, was far greater among those who believe the risks of war are scant — 69.5 percent in this group support continued building as against 37.8 percent opposed.

Even among those who believe the risk of war to be great or very great, there is no majority in support of halting the building: 47.5 percent of this group support a stoppage whereas 49.7 percent favor its continuation.

Belarus Jews make do with meagre resources

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

MINSK, Belarus — In the heart of Minsk, close to the main government buildings, stands an elegant structure known throughout the city.

Third of a four-part series

With its white stucco facade and classical corinthian columns supporting a large, triangular pediment, it's one of the most recognizable buildings in the Belarussian capital. Currently the home of the National Drama Theatre, in its earlier life it was known as the Choral Synagogue and was the city's largest Jewish house of worship at the turn of the century when the city's 48,000 Jews constituted about half the population of Minsk.

In 1923 the Bolsheviks closed the synagogue and converted it into a workers' club. Miraculously, it survived destruction during the Nazi occupation and today, the Belarussian Union of Jewish Communities and Organizations (BUJCO) is seeking government restitution for a building that was once the pride of the community.

Receiving restitution for Jewish communal buildings appropriated by the communist regime is a key element in the organization's agenda, said Leonid Levin, president of BUJCO.

There were more than 100 synagogues in Minsk before the war and many were expropriated and turned into storage facilities or given over for other uses. The Jewish community in Belarus is impoverished, so receiving some value for the buildings is necessary if the community wishes to finance its badly needed social welfare programs, Levin explained.

One of the country's most admired architects, renowned for creating moving tributes to those killed during World War II, Levin has headed BUJCO since its inception five years ago. The organization serves as a coordinating body for the many local groups that were founded in the wake of the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the independence of Belarus.

A former Soviet republic that lies between Poland and Russia, Belarus is home to an estimated 100,000 Jews, approximately 30,000 of whom reside in Minsk. Although 800,000 Jews were murdered during the Holocaust, significant Jewish populations remain in other Belarus cities, including Vitebsk (6,000 Jews), Baranovichi (2,000), Bobruysk (7,500) and Mogilev (7,000), said Joseph Shuster, Belarus representative of the Joint Distribution Committee.

About 4,000 Jews leave the country each year for Israel, Germany, the United States and Canada, yet the population has remained stable, Levin said. He attributed that to the emergence of Jews who hid their identities and described themselves as Russian on internal identification papers. With the end of state-sponsored anti-Semitism, they are feeling more comfortable proclaiming their identity, Levin said.

"Some percentage of Jews are afraid...It's our Stalinist legacy," Levin said through an interpreter.

Despite that history, "they've remained Jews by their origins. They have a Yiddishe pintele (fragment). When they get some freedom, they're not afraid to feel they're Jews."

About 5,000 Belarussian Jews live below the poverty line and BUJCO supports programs to alleviate their plight. With the assistance of volunteers, BUJCO provides food, clothing, home repair as well as meals on wheels. It also operates social assistance programs in close cooperation with the Joint, Levin said.

The programs are run on a shoestring budget that is so meagre, Levin is embarrassed to reveal it. It's "shameful," he said, only $1,500 US per month provided by the Joint.

But Levin is anything but ungrateful for even that amount. The premises that house BUJCO were obtained by the Joint, he pointed out.

Among the projects pioneered by BUJCO are the scheduling of conferences and festivals to celebrate Jews in the arts; organizing memorials to honor Jews killed in the Holocaust; planning an event dedicated to Jewish poetry and representing the interests of the Jewish community to the Belarus government.

As leader of the Jewish community, Levin sits on the committee of ethnic affairs in the council of ministers, an advisory body. The Belarus government "has a special attitude towards the Jews," he said. "The Jews don't have a political platform...[It] is politically neutral. It supports any party that backs democratic rights for minorities."

Despite its modest numbers and meagre resources, Jewish communities in Belarus have founded 18 Jewish schools as well as two kindergartens, one in Minsk, the other in Mogilev. In addition, there are afternoon schools held in synagogues.

The community also supports Maccabi sports organizations, Hillel, Aish Hatorah and many other independent groups.

Shuster, who has spent the last 1½ years in Belarus, said the Joint has created a network of Chesed organizations to help the poorer members of the far-flung Jewish community. The group has set up shop in Minsk, Mogilev, Gomel, Vitebsk, Grodno and Polotsk with plans for representatives in Bobruysk, Borisov and Baranovichi.

In 1996, the organization distributed 28,777 food packages to 10,2000 needy people. Shuster expects that figure to climb to 35,000 in 1997. Some receive aid bimonthly, others every three, four or six months. About 600 Belarussian Jews receive meals on wheels daily or eat at one of the Joint-operated soup kitchens.

The Joint also operates a home-care program to provide nursing assistance to about 500 Belarussian Jews, with a waiting list of 150, Shuster said.

A native of Vilna, Lithuania who made aliyah 26 years ago, Shuster travels around the country to coordinate various programs that link Jews to the larger community in Minsk.

Much of the Joint's programming is funded through the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, which compensates those who suffered under Nazi occupation. That includes about 80 percent of all Jewish seniors. The Joint's budget for all of Belarus is $1 million US per year, Shuster said.

* * *

In addition to the Joint, the Lubavitch movement has created a strong presence in Belarus. Just before Passover, three students from the organization's Manchester, England yeshivah moved to Belarus for one month to help in the distribution of 10 tonnes of matzah and to conduct public seders in Minsk, Polotsk and Bobruysk, said Dov Shochet, a 21-year-old student originally from Toronto.

The Lubavitch trio also set up a youth club and hosted Friday night meals that included a study program, he said.

Shochet admits his family would have liked to have seen him return for the holiday to Toronto but "this is something we were educated about. I could've gone home to a comfortable house but we're taught to put our personal life aside and give of yourself," he said.

Hebron principal blames IDF for vandalized Korans

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A Hebron school principal revealed last weekend that she found copies of the Koran ripped and strewn over the floor of one of her classrooms, and she blamed IDF soldiers for the vandalism.

The Yaakoubi girls' school, where principal Areifah Abeido discovered the vandalism, has been closed for the past two weeks. It is under the control of the IDF and has been used as a lookout post over Shalala Street, the scene of recent rioting.

Abeido said she telephoned the Palestinian Authority's (PA) Education Ministry and was told to leave things as she found them – shelves overturned, copies of the Koran strewn on the floor, a framed photograph of PA Chairman Yasser Arafat smashed and ripped into pieces and paint splashed on the walls with the initials of Hamas and Fatah.

In an investigation conducted by Israel's district liaison officer Col. Baruch Naggar with his Palestinian counterpart Abu Issa Sweiti and Abeido, it emerged that the door to the room that had been vandalized had been opened with a key.

"The soldiers who used the building did not have a key to that room," said civil administration spokesperson Lt. Peter Lerner.

Abeido disputed this, however, saying "the army had keys to all the rooms."

"The Jews have declared a religious war against the Palestinians and I want to know where is the Muslim world, why is it not defending the Muslims of Hebron?" she asked.

Hebron Mayor Mustafe Natshe said last week that one of the reasons he was sure soldiers must have helped distribute posters of Mohammed portrayed as a pig writing the Koran was the fact that some were placed under the door of the Yaakoubi school, and only the IDF has access to the school.

Despite the new incident, Hebron was relatively calm. There were no immediate clashes between soldiers and rioters.

Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau condemned the desecration at the school, saying, "The bitter experience of the Jewish people teaches that attacks on religious values precedes attacks on human lives. We don't know who was responsible for this criminal act, but the act itself deserves full condemnation, like the image of the pig, which is an abomination to Judaism and Islam."

Comrades evacuate an Israeli soldier on a stretcher last week after he was severely wounded by a pipe bomb thrown by Palestinians during clashes in Hebron. Dozens of Palestinians and a number of Israelis were injured in the rioting which continued through the week and into the weekend. [RNS/Reuters photo]

• The media reported that the Palestinian Authority's Web site denies that the Western Wall was ever part of the Temple and says that the Israeli government has turned the Wall into a religious shrine from which it bars most non-Jews.

• Two IDF soldiers were wounded in Hebron when a pipe bomb exploded near them.

July 2

• Reinforcement troops were sent to Hebron as new clashes erupted with Palestinian demonstrators.

Israeli government hits heavy turbulence

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Benjamin Netanyahu is beleaguered. Since June 18, when he manoeuvred the removal of Dan Meridor — the finance minister — from cabinet, his shaky government has run into heavy turbulence, prompting speculation that new elections, not officially due until 2000, will be called sooner rather than later.

Netanyahu, whose one-year administration has been characterized by a succession of crises, both internal and external, is under fire from dissidents in his own Likud party and from coalition partners who can make or break him. His popularity is such that on June 24, he barely survived a no-confidence motion in the Knesset in which 11 members of his coalition abstained or stayed away. He was due to face another such vote on July 7.

The prime minister has come under scathing criticism for his abrasive leadership style and decision-making methods, his string of broken promises and his willingness to partition the West Bank in a settlement with the Palestinians.

By all appearances, Netanyahu has all but lost his moral and political authority. According to a survey published in Ma'ariv in late June, 62 percent of Israelis are dissatisfied with his performance, and if an election were to be held today he would be handily defeated by Ehud Barak, the freshly-minted Labor party leader.

Within Likud, Netanyahu has lost the support of Yitzhak Shamir, the onetime prime minister; Moshe Arens, his mentor during the formative years of his career; Ze'ev Begin, the former science minister and son of the ex-premier; backbencher David Re'em, who has launched a campaign to oust Netanyahu; and, of course, Meridor, his old rival.

Communications Minister Limor Livnat has not as yet joined the ranks of the rebels. But in quitting her post as liaison between the cabinet and the Knesset, she has made it abundantly clear that her resignation may be imminent and that Netanyahu may not be able to count on her backing in the future.

Since the Likud holds less than two dozen seats in the Knesset, Netanyahu's government is utterly dependent upon smaller parties like Gesher, The Third Way, Tsomet and Israel Ba'aliya, and from all indications they are in a sour and rebellious frame of mind.

For the moment, the loudest whining emanates from Foreign Minister David Levy's Gesher party. Levy, a petulant man with a monumental ego, has threatened to resign and thus imperil Netanyahu's government. The source of Levy's anger is two-fold. Netanyahu failed to inform him about a recent meeting between National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon and Yasser Arafat's deputy Mahmoud Abbas. And Levy feels that his role as chief coordinator of negotiations with the Palestine Authority will be jeopardized if Sharon is appointed finance minister and becomes a member of the inner cabinet. On July 7, Netanyahu solved this tricky problem by appointing Yaakov Neeman — the former justice minister — as finance minister.

Israel Ba'aliya, a Soviet immigrants' party led by Netanyahu's close friend, Natan Sharansky, has evidently lost faith in him, and already has "one leg out of the coalition." Sharansky's confidence in Netanyahu reached a nadir during the recent Bar-On influence peddling scandal, and was exacerbated by Netanyahu's failure, since rectified, to implement commitments on olim absorption.

Netanyahu has also managed to alienate The Third Way, which was appalled by his treatment of Meridor, and is disenchanted with Netanyahu's handling of peace talks with the Palestinians. The Third Way's leader, Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, has threatened to leave the coalition unless Netanyahu resumes negotiations with the Palestine Authority by year's end. The talks have been frozen since the government broke ground for the Har Choma housing project in East Jerusalem in March.

Kahalani, however, appears to believe that Netanyahu's days are numbered. He and Rafael Eitan, head of Tsomet, are gearing up for new elections.

Court body slams alligator wrestling

If the mental picture of a panel of judges watching movies showing alligator wrestling is somewhat strange, the results of the case offer an interesting window into different processes at work in the Israeli legal system.

Residents of Hamat Gader, an outpost near the Syrian and Jordanian borders, run an alligator farm. In order to draw tourists, they have been promoting wrestling matches between men and alligators. An association for the prevention of cruelty to animals sued Hamat Gader in court, claiming that the wrestling matches are illegal and should be shut down.

The case revolved around a law, The Law of Cruelty to Animals (Protection of Animals), which the Knesset passed in January of 1994. Section 2(a) of this law (which was used in the case) forbids torturing animals, acting cruelly towards them or abusing them in any way, and sets a three-year jail term for anyone breaking this section.

Other provisions forbid organizing battles between animals, working them more than their physical condition would permit and poisoning animals with certain compounds. The law allows for civil lawsuits as well (as in this case), grants government supervisors broad powers and even sets up a fund for education in the field. A related law regulates experiments on animals, and forbids them where they are not necessary. Experiments for purely cosmetic purposes or to test cleaning compounds require special permits.

Hamat Gader argued that the wrestling matches could not be construed as torture, cruelty or abuse, and claimed that no damage is done to the alligators.

The Supreme Court recently ruled against Hamat Gader, holding that the law does not require proof of severe cruelty. The court accepted expert testimony which claimed that pulling the animals head and flipping it over, cause it pain and suffering.

On the other hand, Heshin wrote, cruelty to animals for the purpose of entertainment is not justified, and sends a negative educational message. Therefore, the court issued a restraining order preventing the matches.

The case illustrates how courts make policy by interpreting laws: the judges created a standard according to which animals are to be protected from "unnecessary" cruelty, but that where there is a proper purpose, certain activities might no longer be considered illegal.

The Hamat Gader case also underscores another issue: the public tends to associate Jewish law with the Rabbinate's monopoly on marriage and divorce, and the current controversy over the conversion law further alienates Israelis from Jewish sources. It is therefore worth pointing out that the Hebrew name of the law (Tzaar Baalei Haim) is taken from the halachic term forbidding cruelty to animals.

In discussing the case, Professor Nahum Rakover, the Deputy Attorney General responsible for Hebrew Law told me that he has initiated a bill to prevent hunting for pleasure, and quoted from an important responsum of the Noda Lyaakov who ruled that hunting for sport (as opposed to hunting for food) is "not the way of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." Rakover was not sure that the judges were drawing on Jewish sources in their decision, but sees this as an example of how Jewish legal values can be incorporated into the system.

The laws preventing cruelty to animals are new, and the proof of their effectiveness will be in the enforcement. Nonetheless, from a purely legal perspective, it is encouraging to see that where the state is slow to move, the court is open to enforcement of laws by civil litigation. It will also be interesting to see if Jewish values in other areas, such as protecting the environment or health and welfare, can be translated into law without creating a sense of religious coercion.

Report: Shahak won't seek fourth year

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — In an unprecedented move, Chief of General Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak will not seek to have his term extended to a full fourth year, Channel 2 reported.

The report attributed Shahak's decision to discontent over his working relationship with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

According to the TV report, Shahak is to inform Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai that he is not interested in extending his term by a full year, when they are to meet later this week to discuss his future with the IDF.

Shahak telephoned Netanyahu to deny the report, Israel Radio reported.

The IDF Spokesperson released a statement saying that, contrary to the Channel 2 report, no meeting has been set in the coming days between Shahak and Mordechai regarding his service.

"The report did not come from the chief of general staff and does not reflect his opinion," the statement said.

Mordechai's spokesperson Avi Benayahu reacted to the report by saying only that the defence minister had not yet concluded the appointments in the general staff.

It would be the first time that a chief of general staff did not seek a fourth year, which has traditionally been granted as a matter of course.

The unattributed television report said Shahak would likely step down on Israel's 50th independence day, seven months short of the end of his fourth year, so that his replacement would be able to put together a 1999 working plan.

In a recent briefing with military reporters, Shahak, 53, said he had not yet made up his mind whether he would extend his term for a fourth year.

But he also said he believed that the aging of the senior command in the IDF was bad for the military.

Immediately after Netanyahu's victory last year, rumors surfaced that Shahak and other top members of the general staff, such as Deputy Chief of Staff Maj.-Gen. Matan Vilna'i, 54, would resign if Yitzhak Mordechai was named defence minister.

After his appointment, Mordechai, who had earlier been angered at Vilna'i and Shahak for taking posts he had wanted in the military, made great efforts to diffuse tensions with the general staff and has developed good working relations with them.

The speculation is that despite past grievances, Mordechai will have no choice but to recommend to the government that Vilna'i replace Shahak.

Another possible candidate is OC Planning Branch Maj.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz, a former OC Southern Command.

Air force chief: We're losing our qualitative edge

TEL AVIV — OC Air Force Maj.-Gen. Eitan Ben-Eliahu warned last week that Israel is losing its qualitative edge, as advanced weapons find their way to Arab armies in the Middle East.

Although he said more resources are needed, Ben-Eliahu added that the IAF is capable of quickly dealing with a sudden change in events in the region and warned that "it would be unwise to test us.

"This is the essence of the air force's alertness. The air force is a quick animal and is deployed, ready and poised to act according to a short timetable; so whenever there is a turning point, we are ready to give a quick answer," Ben-Eliahu said.

Ben-Eliahu said he had no information on any new acquisitions in the cash-strapped Syrian Air Force, but said other nations in the region were making serious upgrades, including night vision avionics, state-of-the-art technologies, smart weapons, laser-guided missiles and advanced air-to-air missiles.

Ben-Eliahu steadfastly refused to name the states he was referring to, and when asked about Egypt's Western armament program, said that Israel treated Egypt as a peaceful neighbor. It is widely known, too, that Saudi Arabia has also greatly enhanced its air forces with advanced U.S. equipment.

Speaking in his Tel Aviv headquarters, flanked by a map stretching from the Atlantic to Pakistan, Ben-Eliahu said the air force had to be prepared for unexpected changes of events in the region.

"There has been no change in the security doctrine of Israel," Ben-Eliahu said. The IAF has to be able to give an immediate answer to any threat. "I see this as the primary task of the IAF, to be prepared for this. This is part of our deterrence."

Ben-Eliahu was speaking on the occasion of Air Force Day, which is highlighted by a cadet pilot graduation ceremony.

"There was, is and, if we act wisely, will continue to be the relative superiority of the IAF over other air forces. But I have to say there are developments. The region is absorbing new weapons, new Western aircraft and advanced aircraft. The region is integrating its training with Western nations so that the character of its flying and the quality of its training is improving," Ben-Eliahu said.

"We have to overcome these developments. We are doing so, but it is not easy and demands a lot of energy and work and a great deal of resources."

In January, the IAF will start receiving 24 of the advanced F-15I U.S.-made fighter jets. Costing about $100 million each, these will significantly increase the IAF's long-range capability. The IAF is also to acquire 15 Black Hawk helicopters in March, Ben-Eliahu said.

He said that the great influx of surface-to-surface missiles into the Middle East was a threat to Israel, but that an appropriate defence is being erected against them. This includes the Arrow missile and Wall radar, which are to begin integration into the IAF next year.

"It won't be worth their while to use [surface-to-surface missiles] and if, God forbid, they do so, then we'll know how to give the appropriate answer," Ben-Eliahu said.

He added that the recommendations made by the Ivry inquiry into the February transport helicopter collision are being implemented, and that the IDF would continue to ferry troops into Lebanon on helicopters.

Don't Be Alone This Summer ... Singles Registry Busier Than Ever

The Jewish Singles Registry (JSR) is expanding like never before and business couldn't be better. That's the word from Rob Singer, whose organization is now comfortably housed in new spacious quarters at Yonge and Eglinton.

Mr. Singer credits word of mouth advertising as a key to JSR's success. Current members are wasting little time telling their friends how fast and easy it is to connect with other Jewish singles. In Toronto alone, membership is fast approaching the 1,400 member mark.

New members can take solace in the fact that the JSR has an implicit understanding of how hard it is to meet interesting people. Everyone seems to have very busy schedules these days and very little free time. The bar scene is no longer a viable solution, and once you have run out of friends to fix you up, there are very few remaining options available. the J.S.R. concept, on the other hand, tackles all these problems and more.

The first thing someone will notice upon joining the JEWISH SINGLES REGISTRY is that you, the member, gets to control the entire dating process via an extraordinary and easy to use computer system. "I was amazed to see how many members they have" reported Debra, a member for about four months now. "Though I have still not met my 'soulmate' I have gone on many dates and have met a bunch of nice and interesting people. I never thought I would say this but the process is actually fun. You get to read profiles of other members, see what they look like, and listen to a voice message. For me the voice message is the best part because it gives you that personal touch when you hear what they have to say."

Perhaps the best sign that the service works are the statistics themselves. "We give out about 70 to 80 phone numbers a week," says Singer. "There are dozens of long term relationships on the go, and for the third year in a row we have averaged an engagement about every 6 weeks or so."

When it comes to personalized service the JSR offers the best of all worlds. Members have complete control of the dating process, but whenever necessary they simply can communicate with JSR staff for assistance.

And how about this for a bargain? You can now join the Jewish Singles Registry, virtually RISK FREE. While a one year membership offers you unlimited number of dates, the J.S.R. will GUARANTEE you a "connection" (defined by both parties saying yes) with a minimum of 10 people within your first year of membership, or you get to remain in the service for free up until you have had your minimum of 10 dates. What more can you ask for?

Contacting the Jewish Singles Registry is as simple as picking up your phone and calling them right now. Their phone number is (416) 483-4151 or E-mail jsreg@total.net.

KISS BLIND DATING GOOD-BYE
The Jewish Singles Registry offers you an unlimited number of introductions, that you select from an extensive Bio/Photo/Voice library. It's a great way for you to connect with people you would normally never get a chance to meet. So if you are looking for an attractive, fun, and simple way to meet other Jewish Singles, call the Jewish Singles Registry today.

CHAT grad helps to plan fun trips to Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Helping friends plan itineraries for visits to Israel has led to a career change for Ruth-Malca Javasky.

The 40-year-old mother of five, who lives in Ramot, a suburb of Jerusalem, established R.M. Fun & Travel, an event planning and family travel business that specializes in arranging all the details for family tours and special occasions.

"I enjoy [connecting] people to a place suitable for their needs and interests," says Javasky, who was in Toronto recently.

Born in Toronto, Javasky attended United Synagogue Day School. In 1972, her parents, Ben and Carrie Grossman, and their children spent a sabbatical year in Israel. This "gave me a love of Israel and a strong desire to one day return and raise a family there," she says.

When the family returned to Toronto, Javasky completed her high school education at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She returned to Israel to serve with the Sherut Leumi service at Shaare Zedek Hospital and Kibbutz Shaalavim.

After her service, "with a hope in the back of my mind to one day return to Eretz Yisrael," she returned to Toronto and completed a degree in physical and health education at the University of Toronto.

In 1981, she, her husband David Javasky, an engineer who operates a management consultant business in Tel Aviv, and their baby daughter Rina, made aliyah.

While raising her children, Javasky led exercise classes and worked as a personal trainer. Before opening her business, Javasky worked in the Supreme Court Building in the PR department, where she guided English-speaking tourists. She realized that she was attuned to North American tastes and could provide a service that Israelis could not provide.

"When I began to receive calls from friends asking for advice about planning visits for them and their visiting relatives, I began getting very busy," she says.

Ruth-Malca and David Javasky

She was making arrangements with different hotels throughout the country (with special rates) and planning personalized itineraries for friends.

In 1994, she started the travel business, specializing in vacations for families and for tourists who wish to celebrate a special event in Israel – a bar or bat mitzvah, anniversaries, reunions.

She arranges everything from welcome baskets to religious ceremonies, the photographer and video people, rental of halls both on and off the beaten track, menu planning, floral arrangements, entertainment, hotels, tour guides and any other personal need.

Her latest event planning is for a simchah where the hosts requested "a more biblical experience." She explained that the family wants to be involved with the land. One of the options she is presenting to them is Neot Kedumin, a biblical nature reserve where there are trails that refer to different parts of the Tanach, including the fauna and trees.

"There are many wonderful places and endless possibilities in Israel," she says. "Canada Park, jeep trips, tree planting, camping, there are so many options." But above all, Javasky says, she loves promoting travel in Israel.

Surgeon uses medical instruments as paintbrush

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

NORTH YORK — Neurosurgeon Alex Rivlin, who now specializes in hair transplantation, paints portraits and abstracts, oils on canvas, using medical instruments — forceps, syringes, scalpel, surgical clamps — plus such household items as sponges and spatulas, as well as the traditional artists' brushes. A solo exhibition of his works premiered recently at Harry Rosen on Bloor Street West.

No, this is not an exercise in eccentricity. "I work with surgical instruments when I paint because I'm comfortable with them," Rivlin says. He is accustomed to their precision and feels he has more control.

His art, he says, began as a pleasurable outlet for daily pressures and has escalated into a compelling expression of personal feelings and a response to the music he loves.

"I am painting all the time, whenever I can," he says.

He is also an accomplished pianist, writes poetry and has produced an independent cassette. His father was a professor of music at Kishinev University in Moldova, his mother a dancer and singer.

Born in Transylvania, Rivlin studied at First Leningrad Medical School, focusing on surgery. In 1972, he immigrated with his wife and young son to Israel, working as a doctor linked to the military. However, realizing that there was no lack of surgeons in the country, he went to Paris and in 1975, brought his family to Canada.

Alex Rivlin

Less than two months after arriving here he was accepted as a Fellow of the Medical Research Council of Canada and completed his residency at St. Michael's and Mt. Sinai Hospitals.

Although experimental neurosurgery was his field, he was attracted to the possibilities of hair transplantation which he sees as 20 percent skill and 80 percent creative ability.

He is increasingly immersed in his painting and the walls of the studio which opens off his clinic are covered with examples of his singular approach to art.

One painting, a kind of signature piece, reveals a bald pate just waiting for the initial stage of a transplant. This was done, says Rivlin, at the end of a long day in the clinic.

Another, decidedly more lyrical, was inspired by Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata. In the foreground, a stream of strong colors corresponds to the marked beat of the opening musical phrases and drifts off to a whisper beneath a misted moon.

Rivlin has done a scholarly portrait of his father, the music professor, and a loving evocation of his mother holding him, her only surviving child. One son died at 19 in the family's escape from the Nazis and two other sons succumbed to the rigors of Siberia.

A striking portrait of a young girl encountered by chance as she passed in the street captures an arresting face.

Rivlin also does mood pieces, abstracts in spring and fall colors, frequently emanating from the classical music he studied in the years when he thought he would be a pianist, before medicine entered his life.

He seems gratified because he restores self-confidence through his surgical process, culturally fulfilled when he composes music and poetry and elated as he paints.

PA officials interested in investing in Tel Aviv stocks

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority officials are exploring the possibility of investing in the Tel Aviv stock market.

According to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, officials have already contacted Israeli brokerage houses, seeking an initial investment of approximately $17 million (U.S.)

It was unclear whether the investors represented Palestinian Authority officials or private business interests in the territories.

Either way, sources involved in the contacts said that all relevant authorities had approved the investments.

Several months ago, Ha'aretz reported that the Palestinian Authority maintained an account in a Tel Aviv bank, where funds channeled by Israel to the self-rule authority under the signed economic accords were deposited.

Visual Arts

The 36th Annual Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition takes place July 11, 12 and 13 at Nathan Phillips Square, Toronto City Hall, with some 525 artists exhibiting. Free admission.

The tradition started in 1960 when Toronto businessman Murray Koffler and his wife Marvelle, assisted by Alan Jarvis and the late Jack Pollock, staged the first outdoor show in the courtyard of the former Four Seasons Motor Hotel on Jarvis Street.

In the Spotlight

Manny Zack, a retired senior administrator at McMaster University in Hamilton, found that his blood has always boiled at seeing stage productions of The Merchant of Venice, even last year's Stratford production, despite its relatively sympathetic portrayal of the Jewish moneylender Shylock.

"I've seen several versions of the play and I've always been embarrassed and outraged by it, especially when the audience laughs and rejoices when Shylock is humiliated and forced to convert," Zack said. "I find it an anti-Semitic play."

About 20 years ago, Zack's indignation compelled him to write a full-length, three-act play called Shylock, which presented Shakespeare's famous Jew from an entirely different perspective. In Zack's view, Shylock is a man who has endured more than he can stand.

After the death of his wife, Shylock's daughter Jessica runs away, converts to Christianity and marries, stealing her father's fortune.

Treated with extreme disdain by Antonio and other businessmen of Venice, Shylock asks for the pound of flesh only as a means to humiliate Antonio.

"It was never anything he seriously meant to collect," said Zack.

In Zack's play, Jessica realizes that her husband married her only for money and that she erred in renouncing her Jewish birthright. The contrite daughter returns to her father, only to realize that he has been driven mad.

Zack's play was staged years ago by a semi-professional theatrical group in Hamilton and has been in his drawer ever since. Now he would like it to be staged again.

"I have great respect for Shakespeare and I do not have the poetic quality of Shakespeare," he admitted. "I think Shakespeare wrote a play that contains the prejudices that he was brought up to believe. I'm trying to show how these characters and events looked from inside the Jewish community."

Ashkenaz '97

Don't forget: While most of the more than 75 events are free, tickets are now on sale for the not to be missed 10 ticketed events that are part of Ashkenaz: a Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

These events include: jazzman John Zorn's Bar Kokhba from New York; the North American premiere of The Dybbuk adapted by Teatr Wierszalin; a performance by the Epstein Brothers, the subject of the recent film A Tickle in the Heart , and more. Call Harbourfront for info at 973-3000 or tickets 973-4000.

The organizers of Ashkenaz are looking for individuals and organizations to help out with the Ashkenaz Parade – a sort of Jewish Caribana! Call 703-6892.

Youngster enjoys Yiddishe concert

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beth Anne Cole, the gifted Yiddish singer, has a lot of fans, but none more devoted than Avra Fainer, 10, a musical comedy star in her own right.

Avra appeared with Cole in the musical Jane Eyre at the Royal Alexandra Theatre as a member of the chorus and likes to attend all her concerts.

Avra herself was the star of Annie, presented by the Charactor Theatre Troupe of Thornhill at the Yorkwoods Theatre Library and has also appeared in other productions of the Actors Chorus of that troupe.

She is the daughter of Francine and Harvey Fainer of Thornhill and granddaughter of Aron Fainer, president of the Workman's Circle, and Fania Fainer.

Avra wasn't the only youngster at the concert.There were several tables of them enjoying the music.

At the Yiddish America Sings concert, Cole was abetted by Michael Mandel in a program of songs written by Yiddish composers in America, drawn from their European experience. One of them, for example, A Yiddishe Mama, by Jack Yellen and Lou Pollack proved so popular that it crossed the Atlantic and was being sung in Warsaw prior to the Nazi regime.

The instrumental numbers by violinist Anne Lederman and accordionist Sasha Luminsky were rousing renditions of folk tunes salvaged from old scores and had the audience clapping hands to the music.

Avra Fainer

Initiated by a grant of $5,000 from the UJA Federation committee on Jewish continuity, the Yiddishland Cafe has so far held eight sold-out concerts, with waiting lists for each.

Coordinator Henia Reinhartz is expecting an even bigger crowd for their next Cafe night, Aug. 17, featuring British Jewish comedian Bernard Mendelovitch. For information phone 416-787-4634 or 416-787-2081.

Film will explore Russian-Jewish odyssey

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A third-generation Canadian physician and a Russian immigrant engineer, both of whose grandparents lived only 100 kilometres apart in White Russia (now Belarus), are planning to make a film together.

Dr. Jack Micay, 48, formerly of Winnipeg, and Yosif Feyginberger, 50, are working on the film, Beyond the Pale: The Russian-Jewish Odyssey.

Micay's grandfather, Morris Micanofsky, came to Winnipeg in 1905 from Propoish in the Mogilev region of Belarus, while Feyginberger's grandparents lived in Bobruish in the same region and lived through the epochal Russian revolution.

Both forebears were from small shtetls in the Pale of Settlement, a centre of world Judaism where most Jews were confined at the time. The area had some five million Jews in 1897.

But what a difference in the lives of those who grew up here and those who remained in Russia.

How these two worlds have fared since the exodus of Jews from Russia is at the heart of Beyond the Pale. One of the subjects to be touched upon is the relationship between the 30,000-member Russian Jewish community and the mainstream Jewish community in Shabbat in a church — where but in New York?

By JOEL CEAUSU
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK CITY — On my first visit to New York City, I felt a rush of delight strolling the streets of Manhattan, knowing that many who walked past me were fellow Jews.

This was particularly gratifying, given that my experience of our community at home in Montreal, is of an often-beleaguered, dwindling and rapidly aging population.

My Jewish experience of New York began when we headed for an old synagogue where friends had recently donated a Torah with great hoopla and celebration.

Shaary Torah is an Orthodox congregation in a crumbling old building on Hampton Avenue in Brooklyn. As you walked up the narrow, creaking stairs of the side entrance, you emerged into a musty room that smelled of fresh paint. Recent attempts at yet to be completed renovations were evident, plaster patches were more abundant than congregants and chairs and small tables were scattered about.

Ten people were there, mostly old men who seemed to bask in the glow of synagogue services, the delightful weather and the appearance of a few young Jewish boys from Montreal. The siddurim showed signs of wear and tear — a testament to use and timeless devotion rather than to neglect. Prayers were said while little kids played outside on the pavement.

After the services, the rabbi sat down and in a thick Brooklyn-accented Yiddish, delighted us with a talmudic parable that had us captivated and chuckling. I walked out feeling a sense of closeness with this shul, even though it was geographically, generationally and spiritually miles away from where I hang my hat.

Our next stop on the Jewish trail took us from one extreme to the other. The Reform congregation of B'nai Jeshurun is housed in St. Paul and St. Andrew's United Methodist Church on West 88th St. in the Upper West side, a few blocks from Central Park.

Our host for the evening explained, albeit somewhat confusedly that the congregation had fallen short of building dollars and/or space, but I'm still unclear as to why the shul is in a church. I sensed that this would be no ordinary Friday night service.

What was most striking is hard to say. Ushered into the balcony by actual ushers, I immediately spotted the large banner suspended from the tall, ornate ceiling, extolling the virtues of "brother and sister together." A thousand or so people filled the building with the hum and buzz of Friday evening banter and laughter. Large stone angels lining the walls caught my eye, as did the small crosses on the back wall, ineffectively hidden by the gargantuan banner.

I've seen men and women praying at shul, but I never saw so many women wearing yarmulkes and davening next to their husbands and fathers.

Organ music and a choir set the tone for the evening. Every prayer was accompanied by upbeat melodies with hundreds of people, men and women, young and old, dancing in the aisles, arm in arm. The prayers and Psalms were read in Hebrew with an almost immediate English translation.

I could deal with the dancing, singing and maybe even the angels, but with my background, the Kaddish sung to organ music and choir vocals made me uncomfortable.

We later got into a heated discussion with our host about the propriety of it all. I came away unsure as to my feelings, but I do applaud the notion of an inclusive denomination, where women and men pray and feel Jewish together. And it's nice to see a thousand or so Jews, generations of families side-by-side, singing and dancing together.

Upon leaving, I noticed that the synagogue services were announced and displayed in the church's original glass case outside the building! Where else but New York?

Another sight that held me awestruck was the Garment Centre, where I came upon a bronze statue on the massive, expansive sidewalk at Seventh Avenue and 39th Street.

There, amid the din, the street noise, the action and the bustle of commerce, sat the Old Man at a sewing machine, face stolid, kippah on his head. Here was a symbol of the Jewish contribution to the city and the world, eloquently and tastefully conceived.

Workers take their breaks at his feet; weary shoppers, strollers and tourists rest beneath his vigilant labor. It was quite remarkable.

A Jewish odyssey

Toronto.

Micay and Feyginberger met in Toronto by accident, and their mutual interest in film and in the Russian-Jewish odyssey led to their work on Beyond the Pale.

"We hope to raise about $200,000 in the community to make the film, a one-hour documentary, to air on a Canadian TV channel, probably in 1998," said Feyginberger.

More information is available from Micay at 416-977-0569.

Micay, who spends more time on filmmaking than in his medical practice, has already won major awards for his work (among other projects, he does science films for teenagers).

Feyginberger, a consultant on power generating technology, made a 13-minute video, Biography of a Revival, on the Toronto Russian-Jewish community. The film aired in May 1996.

Micay's father, Nathan, died in 1984, and though blind, ran a successful sporting goods business, Athletes Wear, in Winnipeg. His mother, Fay Park-Micay, who has remarried, lives in Winnipeg.

"My father corresponded with cousins in the Soviet Union during the 1970s and 1980s and tried to bring them to Canada, but the grandfather didn't want to come and later he died. We continue to correspond with the family," said Micay.

Efforts to reunite the far-flung branches of the family succeeded in 1990 when three generations of related Micanofskys came from Russia to settle in Winnipeg.

Micay's grandmother, Rachel Lockshin, has numerous descendants in Toronto. A Lockshin-Micanofsky family reunion in Winnipeg last summer attracted 150, and the next one is planned for Toronto in 1999.

Israelis develop new way to diagnose tumors

By LEE YANOWITCH
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS —Scientists from Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science have developed a new way of diagnosing breast tumors that could someday replace painful and invasive biopsies.

A team has made significant improvements in the use of magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) in order to distinguish between benign and malignant tumors, predict the prognosis of breast cancer and judge the effectiveness of therapy.

"The method has been tested on mice in which a human breast tumor has been implanted," said the research team's lead scientist, Hadassa Degani, in an interview in Paris, where she is on sabbatical doing research at the Pasteur Institute. "The information is very detailed and allows total diagnosis."

The method consists of injecting a contrasting agent, or dye, into the patient's bloodstream, and using MRI to monitor how the dye moves into the tumor and is distributed through the tumor tissue.

Monitoring the movement of the contrasting agent allows two criteria to be measured: the vascularity, or porosity, of the blood vessels in the tumor, and the space between the cells.

Because these criteria tend to differ in benign and malignant tumors, monitoring them makes a diagnosis possible.

In fibroadenoma, the most common type of benign breast tumor, blood vessels that feed the tumor are fewer and less porous. Blood vessels in malignant tumors tend to be more numerous and permeable, and the space between the cells smaller.

Using MRI is also more effective than a needle biopsy in that it shows the entire tumor, which would otherwise require radical surgery, Degani said.

"It's not painful, it's not surgery," said Degani, who was trained as a chemist, but began doing breast cancer research in 1985.

"It would definitely help women psychologically if the type of cancer they have can be determined without a long wait for the result."

Degani's team of doctoral students at Weizmann and radiologists from Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical Centre were able to use the method to diagnose breast tumors on 18 women, eight of whom had fibroadenoma and 10 had malignant tumors.

"To what extent it would really reduce the number of biopsies and provide reliable prognosis has yet to be determined," Degani said.

"A statistical study now has to be obtained with clinical trials. My goal now is to find the means to conduct clinical trials.

"My country is small," she said, explaining that a larger sample of people was necessary. Even if we can reduce by one half the number of biopsies, that would be a lot."

Degani said the method can be used on other organs, possibly even for brain tumors, and is being tested on kidney and liver transplants.

Genetic screening reduces incidence of Tay-Sachs

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The incidence in Quebec of Tay-Sachs, a fatal hereditary disease found almost exclusively among Jews of Eastern European descent, has fallen by 90 percent over the last 25 years, an outcome attributed mainly to the Montreal Children's Hospital (MCH) widespread genetic screening program in high schools.

In a recent article in the American Journal of Human Genetics, the MCH team reports that, since the program's inception in 1972, only one Ashkenazi child has been born with the disease in Montreal, and that was to a couple who had not been screened.

Three other Tay-Sachs cases have been reported in the province, all among a small French-Canadian community in the Lac St. Jean region, where a mutation is found, and to untested parents.

Montreal is the only city with a systematic screening program in Jewish high schools and public ones with large concentrations of students. The high proportion of Jewish children attending day schools and the concentration of Jews in certain neighborhoods, and thus in certain public schools, has made it easier to reach most of the targeted population.

The MCH recorded similar results in its screening for B-thalassemia, a hereditary disease found chiefly among those of Greek and Italian origin, but also Sephardi Jews.

Between 1972-92, the MCH screened 14,844 senior high school students of Ashkenazi origin, and identified 521 carriers, or 1:28. (The general frequency is given as 1:27 among Ashkenazim.) Participation is entirely voluntary. The MCH figures that 89 percent of the target population over this time took part in the educational component of the program, of whom 67 percent took part in the subsequent screening. The results are given confidentially to the students.

"From demographic data, we deduce that virtually all the carriers identified in the high school screening program remembered their status, had their partner tested if they did not already know they were a carrier couple, and took up the options for reproductive counseling/prenatal diagnosis," the authors state.

They note that today all couples seeking prenatal diagnosis for Tay-Sachs discovered their status in the screening program when in high school, while at the beginning of the program, it was always because there was a family history of the disease.

The program goes to nearly all the schools affiliated with the Association of Jewish Day Schools, and those under the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal, which have high concentrations of Jewish students.

Montreal's screening program is unique in its outreach to senior high school students, 16 years of age. It was introduced shortly after prenatal diagnosis was available in Quebec for Tay-Sachs, with the cooperation of the Jewish community. The programs are reviewed and approved by the school administrations and parent-teacher committees.

The only schools not participating are a few in the ultra-Orthodox communities, which make use of a New York-based screening program. The MCH estimates that it finds 59 percent of carriers in the total number of Ashkenazim in the target age group.

All students at each school are invited to the initial education session, which covers an introduction to genetic principles; an overview of recessive genetic diseases, like Tay-Sachs, as well as B-thalassemia, sickle cell anemia and cystic fibrosis; and an "objective" description of Tay-Sachs.

The following week, the student must decide whether to get tested by taking a blood sample. A form must be signed by both the student and a parent to participate.

The result is reported directly and only to the student in writing, with a signed letter of interpretation. Carriers are contacted later by telephone to offer further explanation.

In the 20-year period the journal article focuses on, 10 carrier couples detected by screening sought prenatal diagnosis. They had 15 pregnancies, all monitored for an affected fetus. Three afflicted fetuses were aborted and 12 healthy babies were born.

The article acknowledges that there have been concerns about genetic screening in high schools, but the findings show that carriers are not stigmatized by the knowledge and find the information helpful.

The article was written by Dr. Charles Scriver, who initiated the screening program, and three other members of the MCH Research Institute.

Junior squash star seeks Maccabiah medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At age 13, Greg Hutner is a triple-threat athlete, excelling in everything from soccer to tennis to squash.

Even though tennis is his favorite game and he's won club championships in the sport, he's best at squash. He's so good at it, in fact, he recently won the Canadian Junior National Squash Championship in Edmonton, making him the number one ranked under-14 squash player in the country. On July 14, he'll try to parlay his Canadian experience into a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, as part of Canada's 250-athlete team.

What makes Hutner's accomplishment all the more impressive is that he suffers from cystic fibrosis (CF), a condition that impairs the lungs and digestive system. Greg takes about 35 pills a day and uses an inhaler mask for 15 minutes each night to help loosen the mucous in his chest, his father, Ron, said.

Despite his illness, Greg doesn't dwell on it all. He's too busy excelling in sports and focusing on the tasks at hand. One of the skills he's developed that makes him a top squash player is his mental toughness, the ability to slough off setbacks and to look ahead.

"I try to think about the next point," he said. "I realize if I get mad, it won't help me."

Hutner entered the national championships as the number one seed based on victories at the Ottawa and District tournament and at the Toronto and District Junior Open earlier in the season. He was never really challenged in Edmonton, dispatching most opponents rather easily, said Ron, president of the Toronto chapter of the CF Foundation.

His toughest match was against Sean Hanna of Niagara Falls, who Hutner knows from previous Ontario tournaments, but he won that semi-final set three games to one.

"I guess I was really mentally focused. I played really well," he said.

Despite his national ranking, Hutner is modest to a fault. He keeps his victories close to his vest, not even telling classmates at Upper Canada College about them.

If Hutner's not willing to sing his own praises, one of his coaches, Rob Brooks, is. Greg is "quite an exceptional young man," said Brooks, coach at the Fit For Life Pine Valley Racquet Club.

"Squash demands so much discipline. Nothing comes easy. You have to have your technique and the mental aspects of the game under control. Greg has good balance and he just loves to compete," he said.

What sets Hutner apart from other, gifted athletes is his ability to stay in control of his emotions in tight situations. Other athletes are good front runners but begin to unravel when they fall behind. Not Greg, Brooks said. "He enjoys every moment of every event. He enjoys the competition."

In addition to squash and tennis, Greg plays on a select soccer team in North Toronto and he's played basketball and run track at school. His goal is to get an athletic scholarship at an Ivy League school and go on to become a teaching pro.

After the Maccabiah Games, he'll set his sights on the North American Championships in December for youngsters under 16.

Karate-ka Canadian women's champion

BY PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Medical science is a wonderful thing, but sometimes even the best doctors get things wrong.

When she was 19, Susan Adaskin was involved in a car accident that seriously damaged her ankle. Doctors who treated her said she'd never get full movement in the ankle and that she'd always walk with a noticeable limp.

It's a good thing their crystal ball was a little cloudy that day, as Adaskin, undeterred by medical opinion, decided to try her hand at a unique form of rehabilitation. She enrolled in a karate program, seeing the martial art as a form of rehabilitation and of protection.

Fourteen years later, Adaskin has proven those doctors wrong — in spades. Not only does she have full movement in her ankle and not walk with a limp, she's turned her interest in the martial arts into the number 1 ranking for a female karate fighter in Canada.

Next week, the second degreee black belt will go for a medal at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Adaskin, 33, has been a member of the Canadian national karate team for eight years and of the provincial team for 10 years. She won the national championship in 1996 and in 1994 was victorious at the North American Cup. In 1995, she was a member of the Canadian team that won a bronze medal at the Pan American Games and she finished seventh at the world champi onships three years ago.

Adaskin, a Grade 3 teacher at Lord Roberts P.S. in Scarborough, is excited about the prospect of visiting Israel for the first time. She's already arranged to spend a Shabbat with an Orthodox family and she's looking forward to touring Jerusalem and other parts of the country.

She plans to remain in Israel after the games conclude and visit with Israeli "karate dudes" she's met at previous international competitions. She may even have to scrap with one of the karate-kas (fighters) in the ring.

Adaskin isn't quite sure what level of competition she ought to expect at the Maccabiah; so she's preparing as if it were the world championships. She practices six days a week, morning and night, for a total of about three to four hours a day.

A 128-pound middleweight, Adaskin practises Shotokan karate, a traditional Japanese discipline that is "a full-power technique where you have to be able to control [a blow] on impact so it doesn't cause injury." Light contact on the body is permitted while striking the face is a no-no that results in a penalty. A karate-ka is also penalized for hitting too hard, she said.

Despite the rules designed to limit injuries, Adaskin has had her share of mishaps. She's experienced lots of bruises and "a couple of broken toes, a broken rib. Nothing serious."

If broken bones aren't serious, what is?

Concussions, a dislocated shoulder or stitches are more serious, said Adaskin, a native of Winnipeg. "I have no scars on my face and all my bones are intact," she says with a measure of pride.

Minor injuries are a small price to pay for the benefits she derives from karate, Adaskin says. Not only does it offer her the means for self-protection, "it's more than a sport. It's a philosophy."

A devotee of the sport benefits from improved physical fitness, but also acquires self discipline, derives self-confidence and learns not to overreact to situations, she said.

If you're confronted with a dangerous or uncomfortable situation, you learn "to do only what you need to do for self-defence, without using too much power," she added.

The Inside Back

Giving Orthodoxy new meaning

By HASKEL LOOKSTEIN

Twenty-five years ago the late Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik commented on the rabbinic statement that the Ten Commandments were expressed in one utterance.

What our sages were suggesting, he said, was that the Jewish people received not 10 individual commandments but a Decalogue — a single, inseparable unit.

This means that we cannot accept the second tablet — the ethics, the morals and the humanity — without accepting the first tablet, the belief in God and His authority over us.

Conversely, we cannot embrace the theology and ritual of the first tablet without committing ourselves to the ethics of the second. In other words, the Ten Commandments are not a smorgasbord from which one can pick and choose as one wishes. They are one, indivisible.

The rabbi then added something, with great prescience: If Orthodoxy wants to win the hearts and minds of American Jews, it will not do so simply by being pious and attentive to ritual, to kashrut and Shabbat.

We will win over the multitudes, Soloveitchik said, only when others see that our religious commitment makes us more ethical, more moral, more humane than other people.

If we fail to do this, he concluded, all the shuls and yeshivot will not help us. How disturbingly true his words have turned out to be.

Synagogues in America are full, yeshivot and day schools are jammed to capacity, and in September thousands will celebrate the completion of a seven-year cycle of daily Talmud study.

And yet, because of the moral and ethical turpitude of a few, we Orthodox Jews are alienating the masses of Americans — Jews and non-Jews.

The term Orthodox and all that it stands for has lately been so besmirched and sullied that when most people hear the word Orthodox, the image that comes to their minds is not "pious" and "God-fearing", but "crooked", "violent," "intolerant," and "coercive."

Hardly a day goes by without the media gloating over another moral scandal involving Orthodox Jews.

Have some of us forgotten that theft is as much a part of the Ten Commandants as Shabbat observance? Is it more important to be scrupulous about the reliability of an eruv in an Orthodox community than about the illegal use of government funds by Orthodox institutions?

And is there any good reason for being more careful about what goes into our mouths than about what comes out of them?

Could anything possibly justify ostensibly religious Jews, themselves coming to pray at the Kotel, spitting at fellow Jews holding an egalitarian service at the back of the Western Wall plaza? Could anything justify Jews calling other Jews heretics and Nazis, yelling "because of you, six million Jews died," "Go back to Rome," "Go back to Germany" and "Filth of Israel"?

The late Yehuda Getz, rabbi of the Kotel, ran to the scene of another riot some years ago, stopped the violence and exclaimed: "This Wall belongs to everybody: men and women, religious and nonreligious, Jews and Gentiles, as it is written "For My house shall be a house of prayer for all peoples."

How sad that his successor, instead of rebuking the haredi mob, asserted that the victims "got what they wanted."

Whenever and wherever haredi mob action manifests itself, it is vital that the community's leaders denounce it firmly and warn their constituents against any repetition.

It is no less essential for all Orthodox mainstream organizations to emphasize, that hateful conduct by one Jew toward another will simply not be tolerated, and stress that respect and restraint are fundamental attributes of the religious personality.

Rabbi Soloveitchik probably never envisioned the baseless hatred that is tearing us apart at present.

But he understood that if Orthodox Jews want to win friends and influence people, they will ultimately do so only by living according to the highest standards of morality, ethics and human decency.

They will only do so when the term Orthodox is a source of pride and inspiration instead of — God forbid — a label that can evoke disgust among others and shame among ourselves.

Haskel Lookstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun and principal of the Ramaz School in Manhattan, is a member of the Orthodox Caucus.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I hate to be a stick in the mud, but I have a real problem when it comes to jokes about different races of people and jokes making fun of people with illnesses or disabilities.

It seems to me that every time I hear a joke, it's either about sex or about a Jew, an Italian or a Polish person, or about a person with Alzheimer disease or AIDS. I'm sure you get the gist.

I don't feel comfortable stopping the joke, especially if it is being told to a group of people; however, it really makes my skin crawl and I leave thinking that if I only had the nerve, I should have said something.

You see Ella, my mother has Alzheimer and it really isn't very funny at all.

Do you have any suggestions as to how I might avoid listening to these jokes?

Not Amused

Dear Not Amused,

I think that if we all stopped to think about some of these jokes, we would realize how distasteful and derogatory they are. They are even damaging. Most people have heard jokes of this nature and have become desensitized to the effect they have on others. Although most people think of themselves as accepting of others, through these jokes they are reinforcing stereotypical impressions that may be very hurtful.

The people telling these jokes are not necessarily bad people. They are simply unaware of the damage and bad feelings these jokes can cause. I'm sure many people who are offended laugh along to avoid confrontation and being thought of as a prude with no sense of humor.

Next time you find yourself listening to of one of these jokes, try saying, "I'm not comfortable with this joke" and walk away. Don't worry about how you are perceived. Believe me, you've given them food for thought.

Remember you can't change the whole world, but you can change the small part of it around you.

NATO expansion welcomed

East European democracy strengthened

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

STRASBOURG, France — Is there a Jewish stake in the expansion of the North American Treaty Organization (NATO)?

Jewish leaders from Eastern and Central Europe see the expansion as a way of anchoring their countries within the West, strengthening overall democratic development and providing a more secure base for a viable Jewish future.

"With membership in NATO and especially with [eventual] membership in the European Union, people will be able to migrate freely, and I think Jews would settle here, and our population would grow," Tomas Kraus, executive director of the Federation of Jewish Communities in the Czech Republic, said in an interview.

Analysis

"We expect that after the enlargement of NATO, we will get new immigration from the former Soviet Union," he said.

Those Jews "are seeking not only political refuge, but higher economic standards," Kraus said. "They'll settle in our country, knowing that it is militarily secure from the Russians and economically stable."

Meeting in Madrid last week, leaders of the NATO countries officially invited the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland to become the first wave of former Soviet bloc states to join the western defence alliance.

Some 4,000 Jews live in the Czech Republic, as many as 100,000 Jews live in Hungary and 10,000 or more live in Poland.

Further eastern expansion of NATO is expected.

The expansion, less than a decade after the collapse of communism, formally erases the Cold War's East-West divide.

It creates a broader, more seamless European landscape and verifies former Eastern-bloc states as members of the European political mainstream.

"It's a sort of confirmation of our identity, of being a part of what we always felt a part of, and were rarely recognized as," Michael Zantovsky, a leading Czech political figure who is of Jewish background, told the Associated Press.

The move has parallel ramifications for Jews.

Since the collapse of communism, a renaissance of Jewish life has taken root in countries throughout the former Soviet bloc states.

Kim Campbell co-authors play on Holocaust

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Former prime minister Kim Campbell, now Canada's consul general in Los Angeles, has continued to demonstrate her interest in things Jewish by co-writing a musical play, entitled Noah's Arc.

As Campbell explains it, the work is an allegory about good, evil and the Holocaust, and raises important moral questions.

The former Tory prime minister contributed ideas and lyrics to the work, and shares credit for it with concert pianist Hershey Felder, a 29-year-old former Montrealer who divides his time between New York and Los Angeles.

While Campbell credits Felder as "the real genius" behind Noah's Arc, she calls her contributions those of a "dramaturge," helping to polish lyrics and clarify the overall concept.

Mainly, the concept is a rumination on the Holocaust set against the biblical tale of Noah's ark. The play's title, Campbell explained to The CJN in a telephone interview, is "a deliberate choice of spelling to represent the arc of a rainbow and the arc of Noah's transformation in the play."

The musical premiered as a work-in-progress last month at UCLA's Centre for the Performing Arts before a packed house that included such Hollywood heavyweights as director Norman Jewison and Arthur Hiller, president of the Academy of Motion Picture

CANADA

Guilty of Hate Crime

Beavis was involved in distributing business card-sized leaflets and stickers from the summer of 1994 until he was arrested in October 1996. The material targeted interracial couples and people of a specific race or religion.

Beavis will be sentenced on Nov. 4 on two counts of promoting hatred and one count of conspiracy to promote hatred. A second man, Guy Carlton Mayne, 30, will stand trial in February on several charges of promoting hatred.

Karen Hayesod Posting

TORONTO — Baruch Gur, UJA Federation's emissary from Israel in Toronto, has been appointed as director general of Keren Hayesod, one of world Jewry's major fund-raising organizations. His appointment is effective October 1997.

Gur, who was the architect of Operation Exodus which has brought over 800,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel since 1989, said he believes Keren Hayesod can provide the glue that holds Jews together worldwide.

Hate on Internet

TORONTO — The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada has been granted full interested party status in the Human Rights Tribunal dealing with the complaint against Ernst Zundel's Internet Web site.

Seudah Shlishit

TORONTO — Close to 700 women last month attended a community-wide seudah shlishit held simultaneously at six different synagogues. The purpose of the event, sponsored by Emunah Women of Toronto, was to bring women together on Shabbat for Torah learning, and to tell them about the organization and its various projects in Israel.

Emunah Women provides day care services for over 10,000 children, residential schools for children from stressful home environments, high schools, trade schools, counselling services and ulpanim for new immigrants.

Participating in this event were Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation, Beth Jacob Synagogue, B'nai Torah Synagogue, Clanton Park Synagogue, Shaarei Tefillah Congregation and Torah Emeth Jewish Centre (Viewmount). Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Synagogue, had the largest attendance — over 200, but attendance exceeded expectations at all six synagogues.

ISRAEL

Housing Scandal

JERUSALEM — Israeli police are probing possible corruption in the sale of subsidized apartments at a Jerusalem housing project.

The claims, raised in an Israel Television report last week, alleged that up to 40 percent of the Shuafat Ridge housing project, which had been built for needy Haredi families, was sold at subsidized prices to people who were not eligible to receive assistance.

WORLD

Kristallnacht Memorial

INNSBRUCK — The ski resort town of Innsbruck in the Austrian Tyrol has erected a Kristallnacht monument thanks to a grassroots initiative by local students.

The monument, a 20-foot-tall, stylized menorah, was unveiled in June. The candles on the monument, which is located in a central Innsbruck square, will be lighted by a laser beam each year on Nov. 9 in commemoration of the Kristallnacht pogroms on that date in 1938.

Neo-Nazi Sentenced

BUDAPEST — The Budapest City Court has sentenced a Hungarian neo-Nazi leader to one year in prison for inciting racial hatred.

The judge ruled that a speech given by Albert Szabo last October to mark the 40th anniversary of the Hungarian anti-Soviet uprising went beyond the limits of freedom of speech.

In the speech, Szabo said, "Hungary will soon be handed over to the caftan-robed and kippah-wearing Zionists."

He also called for the exclusion of Jews from high-profile Hungarian political jobs.

Yeshiva U Commencement

NEW YORK — Thirty-six Canadians were among the more than 2,000 members of the class of 1997 receiving degrees at Yeshiva University's 66th annual commencement, held at Madison Square Garden.

Food Industry Scholarships

CHICAGO — The Kosher Food Distributors Association (KFDA) has awarded three $600 scholarships to Jewish day schools to be used for a student of the school's choice.

The scholarships help advance the study of Jewish life as well as general areas of education.

Among the schools selected were United Synagogue Day Schools in Toronto. The sponsoring KFDA distributor was Barney Barenholtz of Kofman-Barenholtz Foods Ltd.

Jewish Canadians invested in Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Former Canadian Jewish Congress national president Dorothy Reitman was among several Jewish Canadians appointed this month to the Order of Canada.

Governor General Romeo LeBlanc named 70 appointments to the Order, established in 1967 to recognize outstanding achievement and service. Appointments are announced twice a year.

Reitman, who served as CJC president from 1986 to 1989, was named a member of the Order, its second highest rank.

Also named members were volunteer Sigmund Reiser of Willowdale, Ont., and Joseph Zatzman of Halifax, a former mayor of Dartmouth.

Appointed officers of the Order were businessman Harold Seigel of Toronto, physician Samuel Solomon of Westmount, Que., and businessman and philanthropist George Rosengarten of Montreal.

The recipients will be invited to a future ceremony at Rideau Hall, where they will invested into the Order.

Kronis solo woman rower for Canada

By VIVA PRESS
Special to The CJN

'It's scary to be the only one in the boat'

JERUSALEM — Tamara Kronis is representing Canada at the 15th Maccabi Games — as the only one on her team.

When Kronis first saw the ad in Canada Rowing magazine calling for rowers to represent Canada this summer in Israel, she thought it would be a great experience.

"I had no idea I'd be the only one on the team," the 23-year-old says.

Instead of rowing in an eight-person boat as she had imagined, Kronis will be sculling by herself.

"I learned to row first, so I'm better at it," she says matter-of-factly. "I like sculling, too, but for competition I like rowing better."

After she was in a car accident in her second year, she returned to her parents' home in Downsview, Ont., to recuperate. Rather than giving up rowing, Kronis joined the rowing team at the University of Toronto (U of T), to which she had transferred for a semester.

"I wasn't able to compete with U of T because of my injuries," she says, "but rowing with the University of Toronto team helped me improve my skills a lot."

When she returned to Brandeis, she learned that the university had cancelled its openweight women's program. That meant the 150-pound Kronis could no longer row for the school.

Rather than lose her skills, however, she began rowing with the Boston community team.

After a year as a competitor with the community club, she became the coach of the high school development program at the club.

Tamara Kronis

"I love coaching," she says smiling. "It's a chance to build a whole boat from the outside, to put all the elements of rowing together and make the team work in unison."

In 1995, Kronis returned to Toronto, this time to attend law school at the U of T, where she is concurrently pursuing a PhD in political science.

She has continued rowing when possible. She rowed at the Bayside rowing club in Toronto last summer and then for a short time in the fall.

"I'm nervous because it's my first international competition," she says. "It's scary to be the only one in the boat.

"All you have is you," she explains. "There are no excuses for mistakes."

Still, Kronis says she's looking forward to the competition.

Kronis arrived in Israel on May 7 to start her summer job as an intern at the Supreme Court in Jerusalem.

Her routine is vigorous. She works out at least once a day, sometimes getting up at 6 a.m., other times going after work. Her workouts at the Dan Pearl Hotel's gym include 45 minutes on the rowing machine, a two-hour weight-circuit every other day and 45 minutes of cardiovascular activity — jogging, swimming, biking or more rowing.

Between her workouts, she also conducts research for Supreme Court President Aharon Barak.

And every weekend, Kronis heads for Tel Aviv, where she rows at the Tel Aviv club to fine-tune her skills. At the club there, she rows either in a single boat or with the eight-man team.
